Sir Thomas Wilson refused to make any such engagement, and only two days ago that refusal had been confirmed in a personal interview which he (Lord R. Grosvenor) had had with the agent of Sir Thomas Wilson. There was really no difference in principle between the present and the former Bills promoted by Sir Thomas Wilson; the provisions of the will clearly refused building power; and, even if he had shown an inclination to enter into any such engagement, the House, who ought to consider themselves trustees for the public, should, when they found an attempt made by means of a Bill of such a description to inclose an enormous open space of ground in the neighbourhood of the metropolis, refuse at once to give their assent to any such measure. It was said that Sir Thomas Wilson had power now to build over the estate, but it was perfectly clear that such power was useless unless Parliament gave him the leasing powers he sought, and conceiving, as he did, that there were the strongest objections to granting them, he should move that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."

SIR FREDERIC THESIGER said, he must disclaim the slightest personal interest in the question or knowledge of Sir Thomas Wilson or any of his family, and he considered that he was acting only in accordance with the wish which must be felt by every Member of that House that no injustice should be done if this Bill was allowed to pass. But he must confess that, so far from thinking the arguments either of the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord R. Grosvenor), or those contained in the paper of "reasons" to which he had alluded, were conclusive against the measure, in his opinion, formed as it had been most impartially, very great injustice would be done if this Bill were not allowed to pass. The reasons on which he had founded that opinion, erroneous though they might be, he would submit to the dispassionate consideration of the House. He was quite aware that a very strong feeling existed in the public mind against Sir Thomas Wilson, in consequence of the desire which he appeared to have entertained for some time past of inclosing Hampstead Heath. He knew nothing whatever of the merits of that question except that which he had gathered from the newspapers of the day, but he must say he should be extremely sorry if any such plan should be ever successful, and would do all he could in his power to resist it. But, if he was rightly informed, the present measure had no reference whatever to any portion of Hampstead Heath, or to any land abutting upon it; for the land it dealt with was, according to the information he had received, at least a mile from the heath, and there was no part in sight of it. In the reasons which had been submitted he found, among others, it was urged that if this concession were made it would be cited as a precedent for the granting of similar powers over the land abutting on the heath. Now, he did not consider that a fair and legitimate argument. The House ought to deal with a question on its own merits, doing that which they considered right on the present occasion, and not withholding its sanction to a measure because they thought it would be cited in favour of something that would be wrong subsequently. The position of Sir Thomas Wilson, the owner of the property, was not quite understood in reference to this matter. He was the tenant for life under his father's will, with power of leasing for twenty-one years, and, supposing him to die to-morrow without children, his nephews, who were all of age, being successors in tail to the property, would become immediately absolute owners of the property, and might lease it for ninety-nine or 999 years without coming to Parliament at all, or, if they chose, cover the land with buildings. But it appeared, by certain codicils made by Sir Thomas Wilson's father, that he gave power to grant building leases with respect to certain portions of his property at Woolwich and Charlton; the codicils were made in reference to the then state of the property, and it was upon those considerations that the Judges had given their opinion on this Bill to the House of Lords. Much stress had been laid on the fact that that opinion was adverse to the Bill, but let the House consider the position of the Judges with regard to the advice they gave on Estate Bills. They expressed no judicial opinion, but merely gave their advice to the Lords, which their Lordships could adopt or not as they pleased. It seemed to him that the argument drawn from the circumstance of the Judges having given an adverse opinion cut exactly the other way, because it showed how strong the case must be which would induce the Lords, departing from their usual course, to be dissatisfied with the opinion of the Judges and pass the Bill, adopting a course which was said to be unprecedented. That was an argument the other way altogether, and, so far from being an "unanswerable reason," certainly told against the opposers of the measure. With great deference, and supported as he was by the opinion of the House of Lords on this subject, he thought the advice given by the Judges was not very well founded, or the result of a very careful consideration of the circumstances of the case. The noble Lord the Member for Middlesex was aware that, since the codicils, the Finchley Road had been driven through the estate from south to north, and a railroad had been constructed from west to east; the state of things was so entirely different from what it was at the time the codicils were made that he thought he might, without the display of too much confidence, venture to say he should have come to a different conclusion from that at which the Judges had arrived. It was probable that at the time the owner of the estate made the codicil he never contemplated that the population would advance so rapidly in that direction; and, in respect to land which was capable of being applied only to agricultural purposes, nobody by wills or settlements in which that land was dealt with would think of giving building powers—the thing would be ridiculous. That might have been the case with the late Sir Thomas Wilson, and he might have been in the state of mind in which the noble owner of Burlington House was, who built it in its present situation, because he thought London would never extend so far. He put it to the candid consideration of the House whether any prudent person who was the absolute owner of this estate would not, instead of keeping it in useless coppice, have applied it to the only purpose for which it was applicable under the existing state of things? And when they considered what the intentions of the testator must have been, if he had in view the altered circumstances of the case, it was almost conclusive in favour of the argument that he would have given those powers for the improvement of the estate which he himself would have exercised if he had been absolute owner in possession. He, therefore, ventured to think that the Judges had misapprehended the case, and had not given that careful attention to all the circumstances which they might have done, and in that opinion he was confirmed by the circumstance that the House of Lords had not adopted their advice. The noble Lord (Lord R. Grosvenor) had said the Members of that House were trustees for the public, and ought to take care that a large spot of open ground should not be inclosed, in order that the public might have health and recreation, but this measure did not ask to have a large open piece of ground inclosed. A considerable portion of this very land in question had been let out as a park, and the public had no access to it whatever. They might pass along the railroad and the Finchley Road, but resorting to it for health and recreation was entirely out of the question. The real reason why the opponents of the Bill hoped it would be rejected was, because, at some former period, Sir Thomas Wilson had projected a plan for inclosing Hampstead Heath, and the fear, if the present Bill was passed, it might be used as a precedent or an argument for the inclosure of Hampstead Heath at some future time. He did not think that was a fair conclusion. Nor let them forget that, in preventing the application of this property to the only purpose for which, under existing circumstances, it could be advantageously applied, they were prejudicing the interests not only of Sir Thomas Wilson, but of the reversioners. With respect to the rights of copyholders, they must have known that, some time or other, the owner would become possessed of the property absolutely, and in a position to cover it with buildings, without the intervention of the Legislature. Although he himself was perfectly indifferent to the decision the House might come to, he was yet extremely desirous that no injustice should be done, which he believed would be the case if the Bill were rejected.

Mr. BERNAL OSBORNE said, that though the Bill came before the House under the specious guise of a private Bill, it was to all intents and purposes a public measure. He thought the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman who had last spoken could hardly have furnished the House with satisfactory reasons for up-setting the will of the late Sir Thomas Wilson; for, let them recollect, that was the object of this Bill. He did not know whether the doctrines laid down by the hon. and learned Gentleman would be satisfactory to the legal profession, but he did not think that the disrespectful way in which the hon. and learned Gentleman had spoken of the opinions of two of the greatest Judges of the land, would be received with satisfaction by the profession. Who were the learned Judges who had given a decision on this question—"Whether the late Sir Thomas Wilson desired to omit his property at Hampstead from the provisions of his will which gave building powers on his other estates," and who had reported that they "saw no reason for setting aside the dispositions of his will." That Report was signed by Frederick Pollock and Edward Vaughan Williams, who were admitted to be two of the ablest and most respected Judges on the bench. The hon. and learned Gentleman had kept some material points in connection with this measure out of sight, which ought assuredly to have been brought before the House. There had been five Bills promoted by Sir Thomas Wilson, to enable him to build on Hampstead Heath. The first Bill was introduced in 1827, when he asked for powers which would have enabled him to have built over the entire of Hampstead. The House must consider the previous circumstances of the case when a Bill came before them invidiously entitled the Finchley Road Estate Bill, but the proper title of which was A Preparatory Bill for the Building over of Hampstead Heath. Several other Bills were brought in subsequently, and rejected. In 1843 Sir Thomas Wilson changed his tactics, and he placed the will of his father before Sir Frederick Pollock, but not the codicil, and the learned Judge accordingly then reported in favour of the Bill. But in 1854 he was obliged to amend the recital, and produce the codicil; and then Sir Frederick Pollock decided that there was no reason for altering the dispositions of the testator's will. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that the Law Lords in the other House who opposed the other Bills were all in the House when this Bill was passed, and they did not oppose it as they had done the other. [Sir F. THESIGER said he did not exactly say that.] Well, at all events Lord Brougham and Lord Campbell were present, and they had hitherto opposed these Bills; and Lord Brougham had said that the object of the Bill was to defeat the testator's will, and he did not consent to it. Lord Campbell, the Lord Chief Justice, whose opinion he supposed the hon. and learned Gentleman would also treat with a disrespect which he (Mr. B. Osborne) could not venture to do, said that his opinion of the Bill was unaltered, and that it was the same as that of Lord Tenterden and Lord Denman, who declared that it was contrary to the principles of jurisprudence that a Bill like this should pass; and if it was agreed to, there was no reason why Sir Thomas Wilson should not apply for powers to build over Hampstead Heath—for by agreeing to this Bill, you conceded the whole principle. That was the opinion given by Lord Campbell the other day. He (Mr. B. Osborne) hoped the House would not pass this Bill, which was a most invidious attempt on Hampstead Heath. They must not be led away by the argument of the hon. and learned Gentleman, that the land in question was a mile from the heath. A beautiful path leading to Hampstead ran through it; and as Sir Thomas Wilson would give no pledge that he would not build on Hampstead Heath, it was clear that he had an eye, as he always had had, to building on that space at some future time. He would not enter much into the question between the copyholders and Sir Thomas Wilson; but the main point was the question as it related to the poorer and middling classes, who had a vested interest in the preservation of Hampstead Heath. He hoped the Government would take up the matter, and not leave the question of Hampstead Heath in its present unsatisfactory position. He would sit down, expressing a hope that he had convinced the House that by agreeing to this Bill it would be an abominable misuse of its power of passing private Bills, for it would give Sir Thomas Wilson powers which his late father was unwilling to invest him with.

Mr. BOUVERIE said, he was delighted to find his hon. Friend had so great a reverence for the opinion of the learned Judges, which, however, he believed the hon. Gentleman had not always manifested. He had no doubt, however, that the House would be disposed to pay respect to the opinions of the Judges on matters peculiarly within their cognisance. But, at all events, he thought that they were quite competent to form an opinion for themselves upon this measure. It was said to be clear that the testator, if alive, would not have given his son the powers which it was sought to confer on him by this Bill, because he omitted the Hampstead property from the operation of the codicil of 1821, by which he gave power to grant building leases over the Woolwich and Charlton property. He contended, however, that the fact that the Finchley Road property was not then adapted for building land quite sufficiently accounted for its omission from the codicil. And that there could be no doubt that, now that it was adapted to that purpose, the testator would, if at present living, give the same powers over it as he had done with respect to land so circumstanced at his death. It was, indeed, said that the late Sir Thomas Wilson entertained strong objections to the inclosure of Hampstead Heath; and the whole of this case rested on the supposition that it would interfere with the rights of the public in closing Hampstead Heath. He could assure the House it had no more to do with Hampstead Heath than it had with Belgrave Square, and it was merely because it happened to be the same owner who applied for the power that such great apprehensions were felt for Hampstead Heath. They ought to decide the question on some general ground, and not be led away by clamour or prejudice. In his opinion there ought to be some general law, enabling persons possessed of primitive interests in estates to exercise their powers of granting long leases, but, failing that provision, the general practice was to apply for Estate Acts, enabling them to do it in particular instances. Almost all applications for Estate Acts related to land situated in the immediate vicinity of large towns; therefore the objections urged to the present Bill might well apply to all such Acts, as it was only when the land became valuable by the approach of buildings that the necessity for such Acts arose. With respect to the opinion of the Judges, he must confess that he entertained the highest reverence for it, but the House would recollect that in this case they were not delivering a judicial opinion, and that it was a question upon which every gentleman could form an opinion. Whatever might be the opinion with respect to Hampstead Heath, there could be no question that the present measure had nothing to do with it, relating as it did solely to some pretty green fields lying beyond Finchley

Road and St. John's Wood, exceedingly agreeable to look at, no doubt, but in a situation which must, in the natural order of things, be sooner or later built upon. There was nothing to distinguish this from other Estate Bills which were agreed to day after day, and more than forty of which had been passed that Session.

MR. HENLEY said, the hon. Gentleman had not put the question fairly before the House. If a private person was as competent as a Judge to form an opinion on such questions, what was the use of referring to Judges all questions connected with Estate Bills? He should be glad to hear from the hon. Gentleman how many Estate Bills had come down from the Lords against the opinion of the Judges. The hon. Gentleman has asked on what grounds they were to refuse the Bill. He thought the question rather was, what were the grounds to induce the House to pass the Bill? The Judges had decided that the settlement of the testator ought not to be disturbed. He had heard no valid reason why the Bill should pass. It was said this Bill had no reference to Hampstead Heath. But he thought the House had no business with this Bill. It ought to stand on the ground of all other Estate Bills. Unless there were special reasons, wills ought not to be disturbed, and parties who only took a limited interest under a will ought not, except on very good grounds, to have that interest enlarged. He had heard no reasons for altering the intention of the testator, and must therefore vote against the Bill.

MR. MASTERS SMITH said, he hoped, as a personal friend of Sir Thomas Maryon Wilson, he might be allowed to make an observation on this question, and he considered that it was well for that gentleman that he had at least some friends in the House to disabuse the minds of hon. Members and the public with respect to the exaggerated statements made on this matter. The noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord R. Grosvenor) had stated that he had had a personal interview with the agent of Sir Thomas Wilson, who refused to make any compromise. He had not stated the matter quite correctly. The question asked was whether, in selling the property, Sir Thomas Wilson would agree to a stipulation that it should always remain agricultural land; and that was what was objected to, as by making such a stipulation, Sir Thomas Wilson would be making the public a present of 13,000*l*. He assured the House that there was no intention on the part of Sir Thomas Wilson to inclose Hampstead Heath, and, in confirmation of his statement, he held in his hand a letter from Sir Thomas Wilson himself, in which he disclaimed anything of the kind. Although the opinion of several learned Judges had been expressed unfavourably to this Bill, yet he would remind the House that Lord St. Leonards had always supported it, observing that such Inclosure Acts were of every-day occurrence. He could not believe that the House of Commons would refuse to Sir Thomas Wilson what it had already granted to so many applicants, and, considering that the sole object of that gentleman was to improve his property without damage to the public, he should give the Bill his cordial support.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, that as the late Sir Thomas Wilson expressly gave his son power to grant building leases over part of his property, but not over the rest, he thought it was pretty clear he did not intend him to have any such power over the excepted estate. This was really a question of legal construction, and upon this the two learned Judges to whom the Bill was referred had given an opinion, which he did not think that that House ought to, or would, disregard. As far as he could understand the legal part of the question, it was this, that Sir Thomas Wilson was tenant for life under the will of his father. Suppose he died, then the entail ceased, and the reversioner could do as he pleased. What they were desired to do was to anticipate that period, and to allow the tenant for life to do that which the reversioner would be enabled to do. The hon. Gentleman said also that the property was now of immense value, and that it could not become more valuable. Why, they all knew that the current of building was in that direction, and if this property were withheld from the market for ten or fifteen years, the reversioner would have a more valuable estate than at present, because the more they surrounded it with buildings, the more valuable would the property become. The hon. Gentleman who spoke last said there was a great outcry against Sir Thomas Wilson, but that there was no intention on his part to inclose Hampstead Heath. If there was such an outcry, and he had no such intention, why did he not come forward and insert a clause in the Bill to prevent his having the power of doing that which he said he had no intention of doing? But, so far from doing that, what had Sir Thomas Wilson done? As far as his information went, he had one time actually laid out Hampstead Heath for building. [Mr. M. SMITH was understood to say that that was not so.] Well, if not exactly on the heath, immediately contiguous to it, as if he intended to lay out ground and build houses, with a view to encroach on the heath. [Mr. M. SMITH: Never.] Then he supposed his information must be wrong, but if Sir Thomas Wilson did not intend to build on Hampstead Heath let a clause be introduced in the Bill to that effect. There was another good and sound reason why this Bill should not pass. The Commissioners appointed to inquire into the Corporation of London had made a Report, in which they recommended that a board should be established for the metropolitan district, with power to acquire such property as may be useful for the health and recreation of the inhabitants. The noble Lord the President of the Council had given almost an assurance that very early in the next Session a Bill should be brought in founded on the Report of those Commissioners. Therefore, he thought no great harm would be done by rejecting this Bill for the present, as the Commissioners would have power to treat with Sir Thomas Wilson for the purchase of the property. At all events, it would be most unwise and unjust in them to set aside the opinion of the Judges, to whom the matter had been referred.

MR. E. BALL said, the Bill ought not to be looked upon as a private Bill. It was said there was no connection between Finchley Common and Hampstead Heath, but he believed there was a close connection between the two properties. It must be recollected that one of Sir Thomas Wilson's former Bills contained a clause for inclosing Hampstead Heath. As so many adverse opinions—both of Lords, Commons, and Judges—had been given, he should rather pay respect to those opinions than to the reasons which had just been urged by hon. Members to the contrary. It was obligatory on that House to preserve the rights and recreations of the poor, and, considering that the health of the metropolis was involved in the question, he should oppose the Bill.

MR. LOWE said, he so totally disagreed from a great number of the reasons which had been urged against the Bill, that, although he could not hope to add anything new, he should not like to give his vote against it without stating his exact views. He entirely disclaimed taking into consideration for a single moment, or allowing himself to prejudge this matter, by anything which had been said with respect to the question of access to Hampstead Heath, or with regard to the detriment of the people. It might be, and no doubt it was, very desirable that Hampstead Heath should be preserved to the public; but, if so, let the public purchase it, and let them not employ the power given them of rejecting this Bill as a means of saving their money, or of making better terms with Sir Thomas Wilson. They were rich enough to be able to afford to be honest, and he therefore entirely disclaimed being influenced by such considerations. He thought this was a purely legal question, and they ought to take care that no one should blind their eyes in the matter, either on behalf of the public or of individuals. What they had to inquire and ascertain with reference to the Bill was, what was the intention of the testator, and of an Estate Bill which was almost in the nature of a conveyance? They ought not to sanction anything which would do violence to the will of a dead man; but could they carry out the intention of the Bill without such violence? These wills were made for the convenience of the living, and, therefore, the only question he asked himself was, what were the intentions of the testator when he made the will? If the will stood alone, and had no codicils appended to it, saying nothing about leasing powers, notwithstanding the inconvenience that might result to the public, he must have voted for this Bill, because he might have believed that the omission of leasing powers was a mere oversight on the part of the testator, which would be no reason for restricting the advantages or curtailing the liberty which the son desired to have in dealing with property his father had left him for his own benefit; but when he found the testator had made no less than five codicils, and that in the first two of them he had passed his large suburban property in review before him, giving those powers to the devisee in certain estates, and saying nothing about such powers with respect to certain other estates, he could not doubt, as a lawyer and a man of sense, that the testator had the whole of his property in his mind, and that, considering what he wished should be done with it after he was dead, he passed it all in review, marking out certain portions over which he gave his son liberty to grant building leases, and at the same time knowingly omitting the granting of such powers with respect to other portions of the property. He apprehended that was the common-sense view of the question, and that in this case the maxim expressio unius est exclusio alterius applied. If he could have doubted that before, he was confirmed in his opinion by that of the two learned Judges, who had arrived at the same conclusion, one at least having been so little biassed with respect to the matter that he only came to that decision after the fact had been brought to his attention that there was a codicil. This was a dry point of law as to what was the intention of the testator, and whether that intention was expressed in the words of the will. On that point they were fortunate in having the guidance of two learned Judges of the law to lead them to a conclusion. As he would not go against that conclusion, so he would not allow his mind to be prejudiced by considerations which did not bear on their case. It was consistent with his principles that they should do simple justice in all matters. He should have adopted that principle if it had led him to a different conclusion, and it was because he felt that justice ought to be done that he would not have it supposed he was swayed one way, right or left, by any consideration of what became of Hampstead Heath.

MR. IRTON said, he was glad to find that there was such a disposition in that House to reverence wills, and he trusted that they would always exhibit so praiseworthy an intention.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he concluded that the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Kidderminster (Mr. Lowe) would satisfy the lawyers. The hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Sir F. Thesiger) said this Bill had nothing to do with Hampstead Heath; that the Bill applied only to the green fields that were to be found between Hampstead and London, which, if they passed this Bill, would soon be built upon. It was said that this Bill had nothing to do with Hampstead Heath, because the estate the Bill applied to was at a great distance. Now, it so happened that the distance was measured yesterday by a surveyor, and it was found that they were exactly half a mile apart. An hon. Member opposite said Sir Thomas Wilson did not intend to inclose Hampstead Heath, but he had never said he did not wish to build upon it.

MR. M. SMITH said, that Sir Thomas Wilson had no power to inclose Hampstead Heath. He must have the consent of the copyholders to do that.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he was quite aware of that; but the question was whether Sir Thomas Wilson had not endeavoured to build on Hampstead Heath. He earnestly hoped the House would reject this Bill.

MR. FREWEN said, he was well acquainted with Hampstead Heath, and had gone there especially to make inquiries regarding this property. He could say that the property to which this Bill referred was not in the sight of the heath, and he very much doubted the accuracy of the statement that only half a mile was between the properties. He would refer to the letter from Sir Thomas Wilson, alluded to by the hon. Member for West Kent (Mr. M. Smith) as disclaiming any intention of inclosing or building upon Hampstead Heath. What he aimed at had reference only to land adjoining the heath. The opposition to this Bill, he believed, had reference to the object of certain parties who wished to obtain some of the land considerably below its value.

MR. C. FORSTER said, he was of opinion that Sir Thomas Wilson was at the present moment in a position of menace and actual attack upon Hampstead Heath, and it was the duty of that House to defeat his projects, which, let them be disguised under what pretexts they might, would ultimately damage the interests of the public.

MR. GEACH said, he came down to the House with the full intention of voting against the Bill, but the arguments he had heard had led him to an entirely different conclusion. The ground in question must be appropriated sooner or later to building, and to defer the time of doing so would not benefit the public, though undoubtedly it might be gainful to individuals who were in possession of adjoining lands. There was a prejudice abroad that the public were to be deprived of certain rights, but that was not made out very clearly.

MR. ROBERT PHILLIMORE said, he opposed the Bill on the ground that it was quite clear that, in making the disposition of his property, the testator considered the whole circumstances of the case, and if the House passed the Bill it would be violating the intentions of the testator.

VISCOUNT GALWAY said, he thought it extremely improbable the testator would have made the same restriction if he had lived till 1854.

MILITIA (No. 2) BILL.

Order for Committee read.

MR. TATTON EGERTON said, he wished to call the attention of the Government to the hardship inflicted on counties by the new principle adopted, whereby, instead of merely having to find conveniences for keeping militia stores, the county rates were burdened with the expense of erecting militia barracks, which put the county he had the honour to represent to a cost of from 12,000*l.* to 14,000*l.* The ordinary military barracks were paid for out of the general funds of the nation, and he saw no reason why that course should not be adopted with respect to this description of barracks, especially considering the heavy charges to which the county rates were already subject. He hoped some hon. Gentlemen who represented counties would take the matter up, as, he assured them, it was well deserving of attention.

MR. IRTON said, his constituents felt very strongly the burden that was about to be imposed on county rates, and on their behalf he most strongly objected to the Bill. He thought they had a good right to complain of the way in which the Bill had been introduced and pushed forward, with clauses and alterations that were not known to hon. Members generally.

MR. CHRISTOPHER said, he could assure the noble Lord the Home Secretary that a very strong feeling existed in the counties with regard to the additional charges thrown upon the county rates by the Bill introduced by the noble Lord at the end of the last Session, and adopted by the House. That measure had compelled the counties, not merely to establish storehouses for the militia, but also something like barracks upon a small scale. On a former occasion the expense of providing storehouses in the two divisions of the county he represented did not exceed 50*l.* a year, but now the county of Lincoln was called upon to provide parade grounds in the neighbourhood of Lincoln and Grant-ham, and he believed that the expense thrown upon the two divisions of the county for making these arrangements would amount to not less than 20,000*l.* He thought, if the Government intended to have expensive storehouses erected, that the better course would be to place the whole control of such matters under the Board of Ordnance, by whom the public service would be more efficiently carried out, instead of saddling the counties with the heavy charges proposed to be thrown upon them. He hoped the noble Lord would consent to throw the whole, or at least a portion, of those charges upon the Consolidated Fund.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he must appeal to hon. Members, whether this was not anticipating a discussion which would arise more properly in Committee on the clauses, and he, therefore, would submit to hon. Members that it would be better to allow Mr. Speaker to leave the Chair.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought it was more convenient to discuss such matters before Mr. Speaker left the Chair. The noble Lord the Home Secretary brought in a Bill at the end of the last Session, without any previous notice, to defray the charges for the pay, clothing, and other contingent expenses of the disembodied militia; and from the title of that measure no one could have supposed that the Government were about to throw upon the counties an entirely new and onerous charge for the building of barracks. The power of calling upon the counties to pay these expenses rested, not with the county magistrates, but with the deputy lieutenants, who were not now necessarily landed proprietors, and who, therefore, might have little, if any, interest in the amount of rates with which the counties were burdened. If these changes were made year by year, they would put the counties to so much expense that the counties, he apprehended, in self-defence, would refuse to do anything, and would leave Government to its remedy by mandamus.

MR. HOWARD said, he also thought it a grievance on the counties that they should be compelled to endure a burden which ought, on every principle of justice, to fall on the country at large.

MR. DEEDES said, there was a new principle involved in the Bill, totally different to that which occurred in former times of war. The Bill last year was got through the House in a way not very creditable to the legislation of that House. To show how the Bill worked in his county, he would state the cost the county of Kent was formerly put to, and the cost they would be put to by the Bill. The cost was, previous to this Bill, about 80%, and the cost now was estimated to be not less than first to lay out 10,000*l.* for two regiments, and then they would have to provide for a third regiment of marine artillery, besides being exposed to the demands made by the Ordnance, which must be the cause of further expense. Then there were repairs, fuel, keeping up of barracks, &c., and these alone would cost more than the whole of the charge in previous years. He could only look upon this as the introduction of a new principle, and although quite ready to say that counties ought to bear their fair share of expense, he must call upon the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) to consider what he was doing, and the great dissatisfaction he was causing in counties by this enormous increase of expenditure. He thought it was no answer to say that the expenditure would be spread over a series of years, for he deemed it most objectionable that the counties should run into debt instead of paying as they went on.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henley) intimated that no one could have inferred from the title of the Act what its contents were; but he thought a reference to the clause and the circumstances would show that the opinion was not correct. He had no wish to add to the expenses, and would willingly take the words of the clause of last year. There was no intention to bring in under cover of this Act subjects which were not strictly connected with the objects of that Act. The Bill in question did not pass without discussion, as it was discussed at the time. With regard also to the complaint made by the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire, one of the clauses relating to store rooms, adopted in the Act of last Session, had formed a regular portion of every Militia Act passed.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, fraud was not imputed; it was only charged that matters were introduced in the Bill which the House was not prepared for. The complaint was that Government took advantage of thin Houses to get these expenses sanctioned.

MR. SPOONER said, he must protest against the principle of the Bill, which was to make that a local charge which ought to be a national charge.

COLONEL BLAIR hoped that if any relief were granted to English counties, it would also be extended to Scotch counties.

House in Committee.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Place for Militia Storehouse to be provided).

MR. TATTON EGERTON moved to leave out "deputy lieutenant of such county, at any general meeting convened for that purpose," and insert "the justices of the peace for such county at the general quarter sessions next ensuing assembled." The magistrates were the proper guardians of the county expenditure, and not the deputy lieutenants, who were not now required to have property qualifications.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he concurred with the hon. Gentleman, that it was more fitting that justices of the peace should be intrusted with these arrangements than that they should be left to the deputy lieutenants, and had, therefore, no objection to the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

COLONEL NORTH moved that, after the words "providing that the premises obtained under the clause shall contain an orderly and guard room," the words "cells and magazines" be inserted.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he must oppose the Amendment on the ground that it was unnecessary to incur a large expenditure for providing cells and magazines, which would, in all probability, be required in many cases for a very limited period.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he considered that the erection of cells in connection with the storehouses for the confinement of men who were guilty of breaches of military discipline would entail an unnecessary expense. With regard to magazines also, it was not probable that any amount of ammunition would be required for the use of the militia, for which a place of deposit might not be found without difficulty. A supply of thirty rounds of ball cartridge per man, for a regiment comprising 1,000 men, might be deposited in a very small space, even in a closet or cupboard, and he, therefore, thought that the erection of expensive magazines was altogether unnecessary.

Mr. J. G. SMYTH said, he differed in opinion from the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) on the subject of magazines, and considered it absolutely necessary that they should be provided. He might mention, with reference to the regiment he had the honour to command, that very recently a quantity of ammunition, consisting of rounds of blank cartridge, was obtained for the use of the corps, and, as there was no safe place in which it could be kept, it was deposited under the adjutant's bed.

Amendment postponed.

Mr. SOTHERON moved to omit from the clause all the words after the words "militia stores," with the view of relieving the counties from the expense of barracks, and providing for such barrack accommodation as was required out of the Consolidated Fund. His object was to raise the question as to what portion of the expense incurred under this Bill should fairly be borne by the counties. He considered that, if the militia were made a national force, the funds necessary for its maintenance ought to be derived from the national resources. He thought that the portion of the expenditure for the maintenance of the militia, to be borne respectively by the counties and by the nation, ought to be clearly and distinctly defined.

COLONEL GILPIN said, he believed that, if the Government would consent that the necessary expenditure should be defrayed in equal proportions from the county rates and the Consolidated Fund, such an arrangement would be satisfactory to all parties.

Mr. ROBERT PALMER said, he thought that the proposition of the hon. Member for Bedfordshire (Colonel Gilpin) was a very fair one, and would recommend its adoption by the Government.

Mr. W. WILLIAMS said, he considered it unnecessary to erect extensive barracks for militia regiments, which were seldom out for a longer period than twenty-eight days during the year. He hoped that hon. Members who represented boroughs would resist the attempt to throw the charge for this purpose upon the Consolidated Fund.

Mr. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he apprehended that the object of the hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Sotheron) was to limit the expense to which counties were subjected to the building of stores, and to leave the Government to provide any other buildings and to meet any other expenses which were requisite for the maintenance of the force necessary to ensure the security of the ammunition, arms, and stores, in houses which would probably not afford many advantages for defence, and which might be situated in the midst of a large population. The effect of omitting the proviso, however, would be to render the clause almost valueless.

Mr. CHRISTOPHER said, it was his intention to support the Amendment, unless some assurance were given by the Government that they were prepared to charge a fair proportion of the expense to be incurred under this clause upon the Consolidated Fund.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, this Bill was not new in principle, but simply defined that which was left vague in the existing law. During the late war the militiamen carried their arms on their shoulders, and wore their coats upon their backs. In such a state of things there was no occasion for the erection of storehouses. That necessity arose for the period during which the militia regiments were disembodied or not assembled for military purposes. It was quite a fair question, no doubt, whether the expenses should be borne wholly by the counties or partly by the country at large. But that question did not arise on the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for North Wiltshire, which only went to prevent those buildings from being as perfect and secure as was desirable, by whomsoever built, whether by the Government alone or by the counties alone, or by the Government and the counties conjointly. He would seriously urge upon the Committee this consideration, that if the proviso should be struck out, there would be no security that these structures would be sufficient for the purposes intended. The passing of the Amendment and the leaving out of the proviso would effectually interfere to prevent the attainment of the object in view, and hon. Gentlemen by supporting the Amendment would only defeat their own intentions. He considered that the best course would be, first to determine that adequate storehouses should be constructed, and then to decide by whom the cost of their construction should be borne.

Mr. HENLEY said, that considering the object of the Amendment was to raise the question whether it was fair to call upon the counties to bear all the expenses to be incurred under the clause, he would give his vote in favour of the Amendment.

VISCOUNT JOCELYN said, he conceived that the question which this Amendment was intended to raise would more properly come before the Committee upon the 4th clause, but at the same time he thought there was nothing to prevent the noble Lord opposite (Lord Palmerston) from now making a statement which might be satisfactory, and might prevent the necessity of pressing the Amendment.

MR. TATTON EGERTON said, he must complain that this clause would throw an unfair proportion of the expense upon the counties, and, unless the Government would consent to place a portion of that expense on the Consolidated Fund, he should support the Amendment.

MR. THORNELY said, he would suggest that, as the war could not last for ever, and as it was to be hoped the arrangements contemplated by the clause would be only of a temporary character, the Government might be enabled to hire buildings which would afford all the accommodation that was required.

Question put, "That the words 'Provided always' stand part of the Clause."

OXFORD UNIVERSITY BILL.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL, in moving that the Lords' Amendments to this Bill be taken into consideration, said, generally speaking, the Government were prepared to agree to those Amendments, with three exceptions of no very great importance.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER proposed to alter one of the Lords' Amendments, which was evidently an oversight, inasmuch as it provided that the Hebdomadal Council should be elected on the fourteenth day of Michaelmas term, whilst the Congregation, which was to elect the Hebdomadal Council, did not come into operation till the fifteenth day of Michaelmas term.

MR. SPEAKER said, it was not competent for the House to entertain the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment, inasmuch as it sought to alter a part of the Bill which the Lords' Amendments did not touch.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was true that the "fourteenth" had not been altered by the House of Lords; but the whole effect of the clause and of the word "fourteenth" had been altered by the alteration which the Lords had made. He would, therefore, submit that this was a case in which the whole difficulty arose from the Amendment of the House of Lords.

MR. SPEAKER said, unfortunately the word "fourteenth" preceded the Amendment of the Lords, to which the House was now asked to agree.

On the suggestion of Lord JOHN RUSSELL, a verbal alteration was made in the Lords' Amendment by which the difficulty was avoided.

On the Lords' Amendments to the clause relating to the sectional election of the Hebdomadal Board,

MR. WALPOLE said, that he thought the Lords' Amendment, under this head, could not be adopted. One of the most important questions contained in this Bill was that relating to the constitution of the government of the University. Now, up to the time when this Bill was introduced, the constitution of the government of the University consisted of a Hebdomadal Board principally composed of the heads of colleges or halls. There were objections to such a constitution, and the principal objections were, as he had always understood them, that this constitution was too exclusive in its character, that it was confined to men who had been elected to the heads of their separate colleges or halls, possibly for special or peculiar purposes, and that the University, therefore, was not sufficiently represented in the government of its affairs by persons so elected by the colleges and halls. The Government, therefore, proposed to alter this constitution, and they had two modes in which, he thought, they could have done it. Either they might have altered the constitution of the University by giving to the University the fullest power to frame a more liberal constitution for itself; or, they might have undertaken through the advice of Parliament to pass a law which should impose upon the University a new constitution of a more liberal character. Now, the Government did neither one nor the other of these two things. The Bill as introduced into that House proposed a new constitution in which there were to be three classes of persons at the head of the government of the University; the one class consisting of the heads of houses or of halls, the other class consisting of professors, and the third of members of Convocation. This threefold classification, he thought, was a very wise one, for it brought the three

interests into play in the government of the University—the heads of houses representing the colleges, the professors representing the professorial element, and the members of Convocation representing, more or less, the University at large. But, when the proposition, as originally introduced, went on to say that these three classes composing the government were all to be elected by one constituent body, it was necessary to ascertain of what that constituent body was composed before you could determine whether you were giving a more liberal government to the University or not. The constituent body created by the Bill, as originally introduced, was the Congregation, consisting of resident members of the University, and was of a more limited nature than that which was now proposed. At first the constituent body did not exceed 150 persons; and as now proposed it would not exceed 250 members of the University. You were, therefore, going to intrust to 250 men the power of selecting the governing body of the University, when the whole of the members—the graduated members—of the University amounted to little fewer, probably to more, than 3,000. But the Congregation, or the constituent body, in whom you had invested now the power of selecting the governing body of the University, was composed of men who might, and who, as he was informed, would probably represent a peculiar and special class of opinions in the University to the detriment of the University at large, and in a manner which was not consistent with the wishes of the great majority of the graduated members of the University. Now, when you had once attempted to give a more liberal government to the University, your representative system ought either to have been put upon a much larger basis, or you ought to have taken security that the members composing the governing body were not confined to the representatives of one class of opinions, but that you should get in the governing body every class and every interest of which the University was composed. It was for that reason, and for that reason mainly, though not wholly, that he had proposed, when the House was last in Committee upon this Bill, that the different classes so constituted, and composing the governing body of the University, should elect themselves—that the heads of houses should be elected by heads of houses, the professors by professors, and the members of Convocation by Convocation. If that plan had been carried out, you would, in the first instance, have made your constituent body for each of these classes the best judges of the persons to represent that class; and, in the second place, you would have had the heads of houses electing heads of houses, and, as they were all elected heads of houses by their separate colleges, you would indirectly, if not directly, have brought to bear the feelings and the wishes of the University at large upon the governing body whom you had so appointed and constituted. The same might be said of the professorial element. You would have intrusted to professors the selection of members of their own body, and would thus have had men chosen who were best calculated to represent the professorial element in the University. That was the reason for the alteration which he had proposed when the Bill was in Committee, and that was the reason why that alteration had been sanctioned by the House. But the House of Lords had now altered back the Bill. It had made a representative system based upon the constituency of 250 men only, representing, or likely to represent, a particular class of opinions. Consequently you would have at the head of the University a governing body which might be in conflict with the members of that University; and then he should like to know how the affairs of the University could be conducted with harmony or with profit? But was this all? If you reverted to congregational election you had absolutely now, as your Bill was drawn, deprived the members of the University at large of all voice in the legislation of the University, except so far as that legislation might be conducted by, and might be agreeable to, this new and small oligarchy of the Congregation which you are founding in the University. The Congregation would elect their own delegates; those delegates would constitute the governing body, and make their own laws; and if a larger influence were brought to bear on them through Congregation they would never allow it to succeed. He appealed, therefore, to the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) whether the Amendment was one which he could sanction? The noble Lord, in liberalising the system, had placed it on a smaller basis, and one which, with reference to ecclesiastical and religious opinions, would be looked upon with great suspicion by the University at large. If he were to address the noble Lord by an argumentum ad personam, he would ask him whether, in reforming municipal institutions some fifteen years ago, he would have been content to leave the election of the members of corporations to one-tenth of their body? or when proposing the Reform Bill, would the noble Lord have consented to limit the parliamentary constituency to the municipal body? That, however, was what the noble Lord was doing by this Bill. The result would be a body not in harmony with the University, and the Bill would fail because they had not adhered to the principle of sectional election, by means of which every class in the University would have been much better represented than they would be under the Amendment made by the Lords. He begged, therefore, to move that the House disagree with the Amendment made by the Lords in this clause.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, it was his opinion that the House ought not to concur in the Amendment proposed by the right hon. Member. He could not think that the right hon. Gentleman had stated the proposition of the House of Lords fairly, as compared with his own proposed constitution. If it had been proposed that there should be a very large body to intervene between the constituent body and the Hebdomadal Council, there might have been some plausibility in the argument which the right hon. Gentleman had used; and he thought that even then the argument with respect to municipal councils would have been defective. What the right hon. Gentleman proposed was, that instead of 250, which the House of Lords had made to be the number of electors, two-thirds of the whole of the Hebdomadal Council should be elected by about fifty-five persons. The right hon. Gentleman, having proposed that these fifty-five persons should have the nomination and election of two-thirds of the Hebdomadal Council, complained very much that this was a very restricted and narrow body, and called it an oligarchy. If it were a question of oligarchy, he could not but think that the proposed arrangement with respect to the heads of colleges would be more entitled to that designation than the one proposed by the House of Lords. He believed the body now proposed would be well suited for the purpose, because it was composed of persons conversant with the duties which it would have to perform. He thought that with respect to the case of small towns, referred to by the right hon. Member, having, for instance, not more than 500 ratepayers, it would not be an improvement to add to them for municipal purposes the inhabitants of adjoining towns, in order to increase the number of electors. Such a plan would not necessarily be an improvement, because it would not secure that the larger body would feel so deep an interest in, or be so conversant with the wants of the town, as the smaller resident governing body. He thought the House of Lords had acted with great wisdom in making this Amendment, and he hoped the House would agree to the alteration.

MR. HENLEY said, he did not think the noble Lord was justified in casting upon his right hon. Friend (Mr. Walpole) the imputation of wishing to narrow the constituency in the University. As the Bill stood the new governing body at Oxford would, in reality, be chosen by 125 or 126 gentlemen. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: No, no!] Such would unquestionably be the case, inasmuch as the whole number of residents would amount to only 250, and of that number 126 would constitute the majority, into whose hands the whole power to deal with the affairs of the University would be transferred. He, for one, was by no means favourable to the government of an oligarchy, and he felt assured that the noble Lord would find that 120 or 130 gentlemen who entertained particular views would naturally associate together, and select such persons as they thought held opinions in accordance with those views. He could not believe that such a body would, in the long run, be found to work as well as one composed of different elements. He could not sit down without seizing the opportunity of adverting to a most unfounded charge which had been made in another place, to the effect that arrangements had been entered into among the heads of houses to elect by seniority. So much surprised had he been at learning that such a statement had been made, that he had instituted inquiries as to its accuracy, in a quarter upon whose testimony he could rely, and he had been assured, that it not only was not true, but that the question of election by seniority had never been agitated among the heads of houses.

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE said, it appeared to him that the two right hon. Gentlemen had set out with the most mistaken principles in the view they took of this Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midhurst (Mr. Walpole) regarded it as most desirable that the three sections of the Hebdomadal Council should be so elected as to be representatives, and to be chosen especially as representatives, of certain sections, and should be considered valuable principally in that capacity. Now, he thought this was precisely the reason why the Lords' Amendment was desirable. It would be extremely mischievous if the three sections of the Hebdomadal Council were sent there as deputies of any particular set of electors. The object of the enactment as originally framed and as it now stood was merely this—that the Hebdomadal Council should consist of men who were qualified in a somewhat different manner, and habituated to different trains of thought and different associations; and this you effected by requiring that it should be composed of different classes of men. But that they should be sent there in the antagonism which would result from their being the deputies of these different classes was a thing very much to be avoided. The right hon. Gentleman's fear that the residents of Oxford were likely to elect persons who would fall into any particular class of opinions, so as to come into antagonism with Convocation at large, was, he believed, unfounded. What you did by selecting Congregation was to take men who were a fair epitome of Convocation at large and who represented the views of Convocation—men habituated to watch the daily wants of the University, and who knew what sort of legislation it required. Congregation would be more likely than Convocation was to select men who would apply their minds to exactly what the circumstances of the University required, and who would provide measures which Convocation itself would be likely to approve. For these reasons he greatly preferred the Bill as it had come down from the House of Lords, and should certainly support their Lordships' Amendments.

MR. HEYWOOD said, that as one who had voted with the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Walpole) before on this subject, he wished to explain the reason why he should now be quite willing to concur with the Lords' Amendment. Since the time when the right hon. Gentleman proposed his Amendment this House and the other House of Parliament had agreed to retain clauses which he looked upon as a very great improvement, and which had opened the University of Oxford to the nation, so that now this legislative body in the University was no longer a body for the education of members of the Church of England only, but one which had charge of the education of students of all religious denominations. This made a very great change, and there would in future be such a force of public opinion brought to bear upon the University that even if, at first, their elections were not so good as could be wished, it would be impossible for them to resist public opinion in the long run. It appeared to him the more generous plan to place confidence in the University, and to give to it the constitution which was most desired by its Members.

MR. WIGRAM said, he did not at all fear the antagonism which had been alluded to by the hon. Baronet the Member for the University of Oxford (Sir W. Heathcote), but he was afraid that if the governing body were to be elected by the same class of persons, it would consist of individuals acting upon the same principles and holding the same views, so that the advantage usually derived from discussion would not exist. The subject had been most seriously considered by the Tutors' Association, and they had published their views in a pamphlet which, he believed, had been very widely circulated. The opinion of that body was decidedly favourable to the sectional mode of election, which had formerly been adopted by that House, and at the University which he had the honour of representing the same opinion prevailed, and to such an extent that a scheme for altering the constitution of that University had been drawn up on that principle. There was the great advantage in having a governing body chosen by different classes, that different views would be advocated by different members of it, and discussion being thus occasioned would lead to more satisfactory results than if all the members of the governing body were actuated by the same views; he therefore trusted that the Lords' Amendment would not be agreed to by that House.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he felt very much surprised at the decision of the House of Lords upon the question under the notice of the House, and he very much regretted that they had deemed it to be their duty to assent to such an Amendment as they had introduced. It was his belief that the Amendment introduced by the House of Lords would act as a lock upon the freedom of the University, and would tend ultimately to destroy its high character. It might be very convenient for the noble Lord the President of the Council to narrow down the question, and to say that the mode of election which the Bill as it stood proposed was more popular than the sectional mode of election. Surely the noble Lord could not have forgotten the reasons which caused the sectional mode of election to be sanctioned by that House. Under the old state of things prevailing at the University, the Hebdomadal Board was an independent authority—independent alike of the residents and of Convocation. For a long series of years that body had performed the duties committed to its charge in a manner which reflected upon it the highest credit. It was all very well for noble Lords to run down the heads of houses, but they it was who had been the barriers to the ambitious designs of a section in the University. A right rev. Prelate in another place (the Bishop of Oxford) seemed to participate in the desire to run down the authority of the heads of houses, but he (Mr. Newdegate) could only say that those heads of houses had for 100 years most efficiently carried on the government of the University. One step had already been taken to cripple the action of Convocation by the interposition of Congregation, and now they were asked to give to that latter body the absolute power to create the Hebdomadal Council at its pleasure. When the measure was spoken of as a liberal measure, it ought to be borne in mind that it was but another clog upon the free action of the University. They were about to render the real governing body of the University more like a borough council, and less like the constitution of that House—they were about to make it, perhaps more academical, but less national. He was unwilling to let the discussion close without adverting to what had occurred in another place, in connection with the Amendment which had been there introduced, and whose merits they were then discussing. That Amendment had been moved by a noble Lord (Lord Ward), whose contemporary he had been at the University. Lord Ward was, no doubt, a man of great ability; but he (Mr. Newdegate) must protest against its being supposed that the noble Lord represented the opinions of his contemporaries at Oxford. The noble Lord rather represented the discontented portion of the University. But to return to the question immediately before them, what was it they were about to effect? The Hebdomadal Board had opposed Tractarianism at the University; but they were about to destroy the last vestige of its corporate existence. Convocation had resisted Tractarianism; but they were about to double-lock the power of Convocation, by placing the initiative in the hands of men whom they proposed to constitute the rivals of Convocation, and were thus prepared to strike a blow against both the authorities which were opposed to Tractarianism, while they proposed to invest with great power that party among whom it dwelt. He trusted, however, that the Protestant Dissenters in that House would not be a party to any measure which should hand over nearly the whole authority in the University into the grasp of a faction; and that they would not give their consent to give up the Church of England, bound hand and foot, to the domination of a body which had done more to endanger her position in public estimation than any other body which had ever taken part in the government of the University.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That this House doth agree with The Lords in the Amendment in page 2, lines 36 and 37, which Amendment was to leave out the words 'to be elected from among themselves by such Heads of Colleges or Halls.'"

The House divided:—Ayes 115; Noes 62: Majority 53.

MR. WIGRAM said, he wished to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the words which were proposed to be added to the 15th clause. The clause itself provided that the Vice Chancellor should make a register of Congregation, and the effect of the proposed words would be to render the register conclusive. He thought it was desirable that persons should be allowed to object to the register, and, if necessary to appeal from the decision of the Vice Chancellor.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he did not think there was any reason for disagreeing with the Lords' Amendment. Any well-informed resident in Oxford would be able to make out the register with tolerable accuracy, and the Vice Chancellor would have no difficulty in discharging the duty with substantial justice. There was no fear of exclusion to any serious amount, nor was there, in his opinion, the slightest danger of partiality, or favouritism, or neglect.

MR. WIGRAM said, if the right hon. Gentleman was satisfied with the Amendment, he would not attempt to alter it.

Amendment agreed to.

The next Amendment considered was that made in the 31st clause, empowering the colleges to make ordination "for the consolidation of fellowships, and for the conversion of fellowships attached to schools into scholarships or exhibitions so attached."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Amendment was a very necessary and material improvement; but having been introduced in the Lords for a specific purpose, it had been thought upon consideration to be exclusive of other objects which were obviously desirable. In the Bill, as it went up to the Lords, it was considered and assumed, whether too hastily or not, that the consolidation and conversion of college emoluments might be effected under the general powers of the colleges, subject to the restraints provided by the Bill; but in the Lords it was thought fit to insert words, first of all providing for the consolidation of fellowships, and secondly, providing for the conversion of fellowships in certain cases, namely, in cases in which they were attached to schools. Now, it might be desirable to consolidate fellowships; but it was quite clear that it was even more desirable and requisite to consolidate other emoluments, because with respect to other emoluments, and especially to exhibitions, there were a considerable number which were so insignificant in amount that they were of no reasonable value whatever, and it was necessary to put them together in order to derive any good or profit from them. He therefore proposed, that being an object which had always been contemplated, to substitute for the word "fellowships" the word "emoluments," which would cover exhibitions and other classes of endowments as well as fellowships. But, besides the consolidation, it was likewise very desirable to provide in certain cases for the division of fellowships. There were one or two cases in the University in which the incomes of particular fellowships were so large, relatively to the general standard, that, although he did not assume they ought to be divided, he thought the Commissioners should have the power of considering that subject. The words introduced by the Lords, which empowered the colleges and the Commissioners to convert fellowships attached to schools, would possibly have the effect of preventing the conversion of fellowships in any case except that in which they were attached to schools. He considered that it was of the greatest importance that power should be given to convert fellowships into scholarships in cases other than those in which they were attached to schools. The words were introduced by the Lords with a particular view—namely, to satisfy those who were interested in schools, by giving them compensation, in case of opening a portion of the emoluments to which they had now an exclusive right, in the shape of scholarships and exhibitions. But the words, as they at present stood, would prevent the conversion of fellowships in other cases, and, therefore, it seemed wise to enlarge them in such a way as to embrace all the cases which might be desirable. He could not help mentioning also that a conversion of this description—of superior into inferior emoluments—was a mode of reform eminently in conformity with the views of the founders, because it was clear, from the Statutes of the colleges, that when the founders provided for the maintenance of fellows, they meant by "fellows" very much what were meant now by scholars and exhibitioners. They were persons who were to be students, and who, in point of fact, in a great many instances, were designated not by the word "socii," but by the word "scholares," in the Statutes themselves. He proposed, therefore, to take out the words introduced by the Lords, and to insert the following—

"For the consolidation, division, or conversion of emoluments, including therein the conversion of fellowships attached to schools into scholarships or exhibitions so attached, and of fellowships otherwise limited into scholarships or exhibitions, and either subject or not to any similar or modified limitations."

Amendment agreed to.

The next Lords' Amendment read by the clerk was that excepting fellowships or studentships from the operation of the 34th clause, which preserves the right of preference belonging to schools.

MR. ROUNDELL PALMER said, he should move that the House disagree with this Amendment of the Lords. A great part of the most important endowments of the best schools in the kingdom consisted of University emoluments in the shape of fellowships, scholarships, and exhibitions. Now the present Bill was not founded upon any inquiry into the interests of these schools. The colleges, in the exercise of the power given to them were bound to consider the interests of the colleges as places of education alone, and if they dissented from anything proposed by the Commissioners, they could only do so on the ground that it would be prejudicial, not to the interests of the schools connected with them, but to the colleges as places of education. For that reason, and to prevent emoluments being taken away from the schools for considerations unconnected with the interests of the schools, the House, at his recommendation, agreed to the 34th clause in the Bill, which referred to the governing body of each school, not only the questions relating to the endowments in which it was interested in the University, but the general questions of the abolition of any particular right of preference to which the school might be entitled. Now there could be no reason why they should except fellowships from the operation of that clause. The only plausible arguments which had been adduced in favour of that exception were founded upon an entire misunderstanding, if not misrepresentation, of the effect and object of the clause in question. It had been urged by the hon. Member for Kidderminster (Mr. Lowe) that the clause in effect said that nothing should be done with the fellowships attached to schools without the consent of the governing bodies of the schools. There could not be a more complete misrepresentation of the effect of the clause; and an explanation of its true object and effect would serve as a full answer to another argument which had been used, namely, that it was of the greatest importance to the colleges to have these fellowships, offices of government and teaching, filled with persons of high qualifications. The clause did not in the least degree interfere with that, nor did it refer to the veto of the governing bodies of the schools any regulation which might be proposed for that purpose. It would be in the power of the colleges or the Commissioners in any case to establish as an indispensable condition of election to a fellowship, upon the ground of preference, any qualification soever which might be thought necessary to secure the election of a person of competent attainments and learning. Take the case of Pembroke College, which had been urged as showing the necessity of the Lords' Amendment upon the clause. Pembroke College was connected with a school never large, and now, he believed, incapable of supplying candidates of sufficient merit to fill the vacancies in the fellowships and scholarships which attached it to the college. Was it necessary, in order to remedy that evil, that they should say, when Abingdon School could send a fit person to be elected to a scholarship upon that foundation, and when that person exerted himself in the University, and, after a meritorious career as an undergraduate, showed himself well qualified for a fellowship, that he should not be elected to the fellowship, but should be exposed to a general competition, and, perhaps, rejected as unworthy of the office, only because some one might possibly come forward more able and more distinguished than himself? It was quite clear that could not be necessary for any legitimate purpose of the college. What was really necessary was, that the college should have the power of establishing an adequate standard of merit, and excluding any one who claimed on the ground of school preference, but who did not come up to that standard, and then, if necessary, throwing open the office to general competition. Now, under the 34th clause in the Bill, it would be competent for the college, without interference on the part of the governors of the school, to say that no one from the school should be elected to a fellowship unless he took a second-class, or even a first-class honour, if that were thought to be the proper standard; and therefore it was the idlest thing in the world to say that the clause, as that House passed it, took from the college, or the Commissioners, the power of establishing such tests of merit in successions to fellowships of the favoured class as would be necessary for any proper or legitimate purpose of the college. The only thing that could not be done under the clause was to abolish absolutely, the right of preference, without the consent of the school. It had also been said that scholarships and exhibitions were favourable to the schools, while fellowships were favourable to the colleges. There could not be a greater fallacy than that. No man could pretend to say that a scholarship held for one or two years would be of equal value to a fellowship, which might be held for life. The truth was, that the supporters of the Lords' Amendment founded one abuse, which might easily be rectified, with the thing itself, and had consequently applied the remedy of destruction instead of that of reformation. There could be no doubt that there were some evils connected with the present system; but power was given by the clause to remedy them. One mode was that of requiring the claimants to take University honours, and that was a sufficient answer to the objection that they could not, under the present clause, apply any stimulants;

but they might, in addition, renew the competition after a certain time, throwing it open, if necessary, to the members of other colleges, who had been at the same school. No reason, however, could be shown for taking away the right of preference altogether. The case of the Merchant Taylors' School was a very strong one. The present head master, a competent and liberal-minded man, had expressed, in the most forcible manner, his conviction that the school was so dependent upon the particular endowment in St. John's College, and upon the special value which that endowment derived from the circumstance, that any meritorious young man elected by merit to St. John's, and continuing meritorious and satisfying any standard established there, would keep his fellowship for life—that he delivered the difference in value between a scholarship tenable for three years, and a fellowship tenable, subject to proper tests of merit, for life, was such, that the very existence of the school was involved in it. Winchester School might possibly be in the same position, and he was certain that the interests of New College would not at all be served by throwing open to general competition its senior fellowships, less valuable than any other in the University, although the esprit de corps would always give a particular value in the eyes of Winchester men. He hoped the House would not forget that this question derived great importance from the manner in which the three greatest schools concerned in it were affected. It so happened that in New College, St. John's, and Christ Church, where preferences in favour of Winchester School, Merchant Taylors' School, and Westminster School existed, there were no scholarships at all—they were all fellowships; and so they were by the Lords' Amendment entirely depriving those three great schools of the whole benefit of the protection given by the clause. It was true there was a proviso added to the clause, to the effect that the colleges or Commissioners, if they thought fit, might divide the fellowships into two classes, senior and junior, and that the senior only should be held to be fellowships within the meaning of the clause; but that was no protection whatever, because it made the whole matter depend upon an act to be done under the exercise of the uncontrolled power of the Commissioners, who might refer a large portion of the fellowships to the senior division. The Lords' Amendment, in short, was a simple alienation and abstraction from the schools of the largest and most important portion of their emoluments, and he trusted the House would support him in rejecting it.

MR. PRICE was understood to say that the heads of Pembroke College did not view the Amendments introduced by the House of Lords in an unfavourable light.

MR. HENLEY said, he had no doubt that the heads of Pembroke College would be glad to sweep away Abingdon School body and bone. He was glad his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. R. Palmer) had taken the course he had in giving those who agreed with him an opportunity of recording their opinions and sentiments on this clause. It certainly was a very strange alteration to be made by the House of Lords. That assembly had now consecrated the opinion that it was right to disregard the possession of a privilege for 300 years, and that the rule was henceforth to be detur digniori. That was, he considered, a very dangerous principle for the House of Lords to establish, and one on which he doubted very much whether they would like to hold their peerages. If endowments which had been enjoyed by certain persons for 300 years were to be set aside simply because it was thought that others more worthy ought to possess them, they might depend upon it that that was a principle which would not long remain unapplied in another direction; and that many who were now living would see it carried to an extent they at the present moment little contemplated. It would be fortunate, indeed, if none of those Gentlemen who called themselves Reformers, but who really desired change at any cost, should propose to apply the principle to the privilege of sitting in the House of Lords. The objection to the limited number of scholars among whom these scholarships and fellowships were to be given appeared to him to be perfectly groundless. Just in proportion as the area was small, just in that proportion was the privilege valuable to those who enjoyed it. If they chose to rob these schools (for that was the right word) of this property given to them hundreds of years ago, and to assign it to others, simply on the ground that those others were more worthy to enjoy it, it was, of course, in their power to do so; but it would nevertheless be a gross act of robbery, and it could be called nothing else, and that was the real principle of this clause of the Bill.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, a noble Lord once, being indignant at the conduct of a small portion of the assembly he was addressing, threatened them that if they voted in a particular sense they would be called in a short time to vacate their seats. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henley) did not, in the very extraordinary language he had used, limit the threat to that minute and insignificant portion of the assembly, but said quite distinctly, if the House of Lords chose to rob and plunder, as they had done by the clause in this Bill, they must prepare to yield their places. The right hon. Gentleman, himself a distinguished Conservative orator, who was rather supposed to hold with tenacity smaller institutions of the country, did not hesitate, with hyper-Papal authority, to say to the House of Lords, "If you vote otherwise than I think right, you must be prepared to have your powers and privileges taken away from you." Now, he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) ventured to state that the House of Lords, by the vote it had given on this occasion, had done nothing to weaken, but everything to strengthen, itself in public opinion. And, moreover, after giving at least as much attention to the subject as the right hon. Gentleman, he would venture to state that the Amendment sent down by the House of Lords was not an Amendment in favour of robbery and plunder, but was an Amendment in favour alike of moral and intellectual excellence as against ignorance and abuse. His hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Roundell Palmer) had discussed this question with great temper and moderation, and he confessed he felt great regret that his hon. and learned Friend was not satisfied with the victories he had already obtained, for he had already succeeded in inducing this and the other House of Parliament to invest bodies for the most part utterly incompetent with an absolute power of stepping in between Parliament, between the Commissioners, between the Privy Council, and the work of legislation, and of saying, "We do not care one pin for public interests, for the interests of learning, for promoting the diffusion of the streams of learning over the land; we look at this locality, and as, in our opinion, this locality is to suffer by the change you meditate, we say no, and forbid you to proceed." Well, the House of Lords had submitted to the pleasure of his hon. and learned Friend, so far as regarded all scholarships and all exhibitions connected with the University of Oxford. All that the House of Lords had done was this—they had claimed, not to throw open all these fellowships, but to give impartial and dispassionate parties a power of considering, upon larger and more general grounds than the corporation of Abingdon, for instance, would consider, whether these endowments should be continued. The hon. and learned Gentleman proceeded on the assumption, though he did not use the phrase, that both the Privy Council and the Commission—composed of the Earl of Harrowby, the Earl of Ellesmere, the Bishop of Ripon, and so forth—were a set of men totally incapable of discerning and of estimating the fair claims of these schools, and of allowing to those fair claims everything that was just and reasonable. It was the duty of the Commissioners to consider and weigh fairly all claims not overriding local interests and local rights, but estimating together the bearing one on another of certain local with larger and more general rights, and to consider the ultimate benefits to accrue from the course they might adopt. Those were the duties to be committed to the hands of the Commissioners; but his hon. and learned Friend said he was not satisfied with that, and that the corporation of Abingdon, being the best judges, should have the power to interpose with an absolute veto. Long before the Bill assumed its present form it contained the principle of compensation to these schools. The Government never proposed, with regard to exhibitions, that the privileges should be taken away. They were to pass under review, but all limitations were to be retained with regard to them, and in order to prevent the supposition that it was intended to sweep away these endowments irrespective of the rights of the schools, it was provided that fellowships limited might be converted into scholarships or exhibitions similarly limited. That was distinct proof that it was not intended to proceed on the abstract principle—the abstract principle, so excellent, against which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henley) had directed his powers of ridicule, of giving to the best man these advantages of the University. The Government did not intend to give scope even to that principle, but to provide the best machinery to satisfy every local claim. Was it true that these endowments now existed in such a form as would be most beneficial to these parties themselves? He said, on the contrary, and to a very great extent, they existed in such a form that immense resources were wasted in producing an amount of local encouragement hardly perceptible. He would take a particular case, which would exhibit the matter simply. Let the House suppose that a school had a right of preference to three fellowships of 200*l.* a year each. That would represent a property of 600*l.* a year; but if the average tenure of those fellowships was fifteen years—which was somewhere about the usual tenure—it followed there would be only one opening once in every five years. That opening afforded a perfectly ineffective stimulus to the school; but supposing the Commissioners converted one of those fellowships into five exhibitions of 40*l.* a year, each tenable for five years, then there would be an exhibition available every year in the school, instead of a fellowship once in five years. He, therefore, put it to the House whether that would not give very much greater encouragement, at an expense of 200*l.*, than the three fellowships at the expense of 600*l.* a year? And, therefore, he said that, in numbers of these schools, arrangements might be made which, augmenting the amount of local interests, would leave a large overplus for the benefit of general education. He asked the House to do—what? Not by a sweeping clause to declare that these privileges should be taken away, but to submit these matters to impartial persons in high stations, being worthy of the confidence of the House, to make the best arrangement they could after full examination of the case. If the Commission failed, they allowed them to go before the Privy Council, where there would be a hearing from parties acting judicially; and if the Privy Council failed, they might come down to that House, where his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. R. Palmer), with all his Winchester associates at his back, would be ready enough to ask sympathy, and find ability enough to command it, to induce the House to prevent the recommendations of the Commissioners becoming law. These matters having been so much discussed, he would not go at any length into them, but he wished to point out to his hon. and learned Friend that he was not entitled to the honour and pride of declaring himself in that House the preserver of the wills and intentions of the founders. The wills of the founders declared certain local preferences, and if it was mere sacredness of situation that they were talking about, why not preserve the rights and the claims of the Channel Islands, of Wales, of the diocese of Lincoln, of the diocese of Exeter, and all the rest? They did nothing of the sort, and was it unjust to apply to schools the same principle they applied to counties? The intentions of the founders were exactly parallel. The only difference was, that in the one case there were persons ready to raise a great disturbance, and in the other there was no organisation—no means of raising clamour. So with regard to founders' intentions altogether. He should like to know in what case (where the founder had enacted anything inconvenient to anybody) his intentions had been allowed to stand in the way of putting that obstacle aside? And he should like, also, to know in what case it was possible to urge the founders' intentions against useful reform, intended for the interests of the public? The fact was, the Government were those who were giving effect to the intentions of the founders. Many of those founders were men of enlightened minds. The intention of William of Wykeham was to establish the best college at Oxford, to make it distinguished among others by its intellectual and moral excellence, and he trusted to a most elaborate system of control, examination, and mutual supervision. The force of those Statutes died out, and what was the case in that was the case in these close colleges generally. Did they fulfil the intentions of the founders? Could it be said that any of these close colleges were superior to the other colleges in Oxford? He thought not. He said it was the intention of William of Wykeham to have a superior college, but by circumstances his college had become entirely inferior. And when it was endeavoured to infuse into it the breath of new life, they came and talked of founders' intentions. These were the founders' intentions—to have the best college which legislation and human wisdom could obtain, and he hoped by this Bill and the Amendment of the House of Lords to give effect to the founders' intentions in that respect. Though he attached great importance to the specialities of the two Universities, with respect to this particular question, the general principle would apply also to Cambridge. There was no question about that, and it was admitted, also, that the object of the interference of Parliament in this matter of University education was to open and enlarge the Universities, not to narrow and restrain them. In Cambridge he did not know how, but, in fact, this very thing was done which the Lords' Amendments gave power to do, with respect to one of the greatest and most distinguished colleges in that University. Trinity College had taken away from the Westminster scholars the absolute right to succeed to fellowships. That had been done without the intervention of Parliament; and now that Parliament was appealed to to facilitate the work of reform, that work would not be assisted, if, to use a term which had become fashionable during the discussion on this measure, they allowed themselves to be deluded by his hon. and learned Friend. If the House adopted the clause of his hon. and learned Friend, it would be impossible to effect for King's College at Cambridge, which was connected with Eton, the very thing which, without the aid of Parliament, Trinity College had effected with regard to Westminster. No doubt the rights in question varied in every possible way. No doubt there were special cases where the object of the founder was almost exclusively his interest in the school, whilst there were a multitude of other cases where his interest was in the college. With regard to Winchester, he thought his hon. and learned Friend fundamentally misrepresented the case when he said New College was made for Winchester, and that if he read the Statutes he would see Winchester was made for New College. [Mr. R. PALMER: Both were made for each other.] Now, he thought the welfare of New College was the main object in the mind of William of Wykeham, and that he treated Winchester as a mere appendage. It was because of these many shades and varieties of interest that Parliament should refer the cases for review to an intelligent competent tribunal, in order to deal fairly by these parties. He was quite satisfied his hon. and learned Friend would not succeed in inducing the House to adopt his Amendment. It was quite true the House had twice voted in its favour, but by very different majorities, and the more light that was thrown on this question the more impossible would it be to induce the representatives of the people in this country to set themselves against the House of Lords in a case where the House of Lords had been voting on large views of public and general interests, and where the interests arrayed against them were, to describe them in the kindest manner, interests of personal and local feeling.

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE said,

he thought that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had shown in his last, as in his former speeches upon this subject, something very much resembling the eagerness of a partisan, as well as considerable unfairness of argument. The right hon. Gentleman said that the opponents of the Amendment ought to be satisfied, because the tribunal which would have to carry the Amendment into effect was an impartial one. That, however, was assuming the question whether the powers given by the Amendment ought or ought not to be conferred upon the Commissioners. Those who took the same view of the question as he did might consistently refuse to grant a particular power to a tribunal without objecting to the composition of the tribunal. The Chancellor of the Exchequer also adverted to the advantages which would result from converting fellowships into exhibitions, but the House was aware that that could be done under another clause of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman had likewise dwelt on the advantages of framing regulations for making the fellowships more available for learning in the University, but all those regulations could be made by the clause of his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Roundell Palmer), without the Amendment of the House of Lords. The right hon. Gentleman had alluded to New College and Winchester School, and said that that college was not constructed for Winchester School alone. It was true it was not like the case of Abingdon School and Pembroke College, where the latter grew out of the former; but it could be seen from every part of the Statutes that the founder designed to build up a college on the school at Winchester, and it would be a complete overthrow of those intentions if they were to deprive the college of all connection with the school. It would be no answer to say a larger scheme of education was proposed; for if a school was founded with particular views for a particular class, Parliament could have no right to accept the gift, and then appropriate it in a way as different as possible from the intentions of the founder. He should certainly enter his protest against any attempt to overrule the decided and sufficient opinion already given by the House upon this subject.

MR. G. E. H. VERNON said, that as he was one of those who had voted with the majority on the first occasion against the Government proposition, and in the minority on the second, against his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth, he trusted the House would allow him to say a few words in justification of the course which he had thought it his duty to pursue. The first vote, be it remembered, involved the question whether the interests and rights of schools were to be absolutely set aside and ignored by the operation of this Bill. Now he (Mr. Vernon) entertained as strongly as did the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite the feeling that they had no right, while they were legislating for the good of the University, to throw out of their consideration the almost equal claims of the endowed schools. Even assuming, which it was perhaps fair to assume, that the schools did not in all cases perform the functions which they were intended to perform as adequately as might be desired—even granting that some of them did not furnish the best scholars to the University—he still maintained that they had no right, in a Bill which exclusively affected Oxford University, to put in the power of the Commissioners and of the University authorities, whose main object might be presumed to be the credit of the University itself, the fortunes of these various endowed schools. Well, the Government were beaten on that occasion. The rights of the schools were vindicated. Then arose the question whether they were to carry out the principle of school immunity from control to what he believed would be an unfair and mischievous extent? In the endeavour to reform the University they had not adhered strictly and exclusively to the actual terms of the expressed wishes of the founders, but only so far as those wishes could be maintained with due regard to existing and altered circumstances. It was impossible to carry out to the letter all the wills of the founders. They had endeavoured, in the efforts to improve the constitution of the University, to respect the main intentions of the founders with scrupulous, but not slavish, attention. Must they not, then, in some degree, carry out the same principle in reference to the relation of the schools with the University? In the modified proposition of the Government which he had supported, and which, though rejected by that House, had been restored to the Bill in another place, it was proposed to maintain the privileges of the schools in almost all instances with regard to exhibitions and scholarships—to leave, in fact, the position of undergraduates unassailed and untouched—but it was considered fair, after the expiration of some four or five or six years of their tutelage, to look to the efficiency and merit of the scholars as members of the University. Their career was, as now, to be assisted in its outset—they were to be fully and fairly launched—but they were not to be permitted to have an indefeasible right to a perpetual monopoly of college emoluments, independent of distinctions of fitness and of merit, simply because they proceeded from this or that particular school. He was one of those who regarded with great confidence the Commissioners selected by Her Majesty's Government. He likewise approved of the various checks imposed upon the exercise of their authority. He was perfectly certain nothing would be ordered by those Commissioners, in a sense either unfair or severe, with reference to these schools; and he thought it the duty of the House to reflect before placing a power of veto either in the corporation of Abingdon, or even the school to which he was more particularly attached, that of Westminster. With regard to the allusion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to Trinity College, Cambridge, and Westminster School, the right hon. Gentleman was completely in error, as the Westminster scholars never had the power of taking fellowships—it was a pure question of examination.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he had listened to the hon. Gentleman's explanation of the contradictory votes he had given, and must say—with all possible respect for the hon. Gentleman—that he never heard anything more hollow, inconsistent, and unsatisfactory. In the first instance, the hon. Gentleman had voted for the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. Roundell Palmer); and secondly, against it, because he was not prepared to carry the principle to an extreme extent. He should like to know how the hon. Gentleman expected men of sense to believe that, when he gave his first vote, he did not vote for that which by his second vote he negatived. The question had been fully argued, everything which could be said about it had been said, and therefore he would not have said a word on this occasion, had it not been for some expressions which had fallen from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman said, that the Lords' Amendment was in favour of moral and intellectual excellence against ignorance and abuse. From that description of the Amendment he altogether dissented, but at any rate, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was the last person from whom such language might have been expected, looking to the declarations which he had made on this subject four years ago. It should be recollected this was not a question of expediency—it was not the case of something that might be good to-day and bad to-morrow—it was a question of principle, which rested now upon the same grounds as those on which it stood in 1850. The House should hear what the Chancellor of the Exchequer said in 1850, and then he would leave the right hon. Gentleman to explain his inconsistency as he could.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would not be responsible for the report which the right hon. Gentleman was about to read.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: The right hon. Gentleman now said, that the report of his speech was not correct.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that if the right hon. Gentleman, by using the word "now," meant to imply that he had not before disavowed the report, he must beg to set him right, for he had published a corrected report of his speech on that occasion.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he could refer only to the report which appeared in the usual record of Parliamentary proceedings; from that he would read some passages, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer could state what portion of those passages was incorrect. The question at issue was one of high principle. Like his right hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), he thought the Lords' Amendment would sanction unjustifiable spoliation, and he believed the country at large were of the same opinion. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was reported to have used this language in 1850—

"Into the question of the restraints in the election of fellowships I will not enter at any length. It is plain, however, that neither the House of Commons nor the Crown can assume a jurisdiction to remove those restraints; but, in point of fact, those restraints are of a much more limited character than is supposed." [3 Hansard, cxii. 1498.]

In 1850, then, the right hon. Gentleman was of opinion that the restraints upon the election to fellowships could not properly be removed by the Crown or Parliament. [THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: No, no!] He wished to know what error the passage contained?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I said the House of Commons, not Parliament.

Sir J. Pakington

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he must say he thought the right hon. Gentleman was thankful for small mercies. He must be hard pressed, indeed, when he drew such a very nice distinction. The right hon. Gentleman was now urging the House of Commons to deal with those very restraints to which he had then referred. The right hon. Gentleman proceeded to say—

"The selection is usually made from the country, or in most cases from the diocese. But although I do not deny that there ought to be some relaxation of these restrictions, yet I do deny the assumption that they are altogether evil. It is plain the principle of examination must have some limitation."—[3 Hansard, cxii. 1498.]

We were not now indebted to the right hon. Gentleman for any limitation whatever being put upon the principle of examination, or for scholarships not being dealt with in the same manner as fellowships. The right hon. Gentleman continued—

"I would not like to see a Prime Minister, or any other Member of the Cabinet, appointed by examination. I would as soon have them chosen out of a particular county or a particular diocese. And so in the case of fellowships—you may ascertain the competency of candidates by examination; but we all know that there may be as much trick in passing through an examination as anything else, and I protest against examination being taken as the sole and only test of the fitness of candidates for those foundations."—[3 Hansard, cxii. 1499.]

Yet the right hon. Gentleman now said that the House of Lords had passed an Amendment in favour of moral and intellectual excellence, and against ignorance and abuse. What was that moral and intellectual excellence? Why, it was an excellence that was to be tested by examination. He did not deny the right hon. Gentleman's right to change his mind, but he thought the weight of the right hon. Gentleman's opinion upon this matter ought not to tell very much with the House, when he expressed such diametrically opposite opinions upon a question of high principle within the short period of four years. The right hon. Gentleman asked whether the colleges fulfilled the intentions of their founders; but he denied his right to enter into that question now, when they had such plain and unanswerable proof as to what those intentions really were. Why, this very morning the House had been led into an act of great injustice, as he considered, solely from their respect for the intentions of a testator. He alluded, of course, to Sir Thomas Wilson's Finchley Road Estate Bill. The right hon. Gentleman also said that the intentions of the founders were to establish the best colleges; but he denied the hon. Gentleman's right so to distort their intentions. He would appeal to the case in which he was the most interested—that of certain schools in the county of Worcester, connected with Worcester College, and he would ask whether the right hon. Gentleman was justified in saying that the Worcestershire gentlemen who founded those fellowships and scholarships had solely in view the establishment of the best college? It was perfectly clear that the real object of the founders was to benefit the county, to give an advantage to particular schools, and they could not now deprive those schools of their fellowships, which were, in fact, their endowments, without committing an act of the greatest injustice. He denied that they were open to the accusation of having protected the interests of schools while they neglected those of localities, and such a distinction ought not to be drawn. In the case of Jesus College, the interests of the locality had been protected by the decision of the House of Commons. He must express his deep regret at the course which the Government had taken, as their object appeared to be to induce the House of Commons to stultify itself; but he would remind the House that they had already come to two different decisions upon this particular subject, not in a thin House at the end of July, but in a full House in the middle of the Session. With one of those decisions the right hon. Gentleman was dissatisfied, and therefore asked the House to review it, but they had refused to do so, and declared that they held sacred these endowments and respected these rights. He hoped the House would now come to the same conclusion at which they had twice before arrived, and reject this Amendment of the Lords.

Lord JOHN RUSSELL said, the House would recollect that the last time they had debated this question, there was a majority of ten only in favour of the hon. and learned Gentleman's (Mr. Roundell Palmer's) proposal, so that, if they were now to come to a different conclusion, they would not, all events, be reviewing a decision which had been arrived at by a very large majority. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Pakington) stated that his right hon. Friend (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had said, in 1850, that these endowments ought not to be set aside by the will of the Crown or of the House of Commons. No doubt his right hon. Friend had said so, and he had no hesitation in saying the same thing now; but what they proposed was, that not the Crown or the House of Commons simply should decide this question, but that the whole body of the Legislature—the Queen, Lords, and Commons—should give their assent to a Bill by which that alteration should be made. He owned that he felt somewhat embarrassed in arguing this question when he heard the hon. Baronet the Member for the University of Oxford (Sir William Heathcote) and the right hon. Gentleman opposite arguing for a literal adherence to the wills of the founders, because, if they were to adhere to the wills of the founders, without looking at their intentions, how was it that they had allowed those wills to be set aside and different dispositions to be made in the case of localities? What was there in the case of schools which would justify their acting towards them in a separate manner? The question, therefore, came to this—whether, having adopted certain words with regard to these preferences in a former clause, which had been agreed to both by the Lords and the Commons, namely—

“And whereas it is expedient for the interests of religion and learning to enable colleges to alter and amend their Statutes with respect to eligibility to headships, fellowships, and other college emoluments, and the tenure thereof, and to ensure the same being conferred according to personal merits and fitness, and for that purpose to modify or abolish any preference, and to make ordinances for promoting the main designs of the founders and donors,”— whether, having agreed to that preamble, and given the Commissioners power to carry this purpose into effect, they had altogether parted with their right to touch any of the dispositions made by the founders, and were to preserve sacred and inviolate every endowment they had made, however mischievous might be its operation at the present time? The argument of the Government was that the founders never intended that the foundations which they established for the purpose of promoting religion and learning should be rather made a hindrance to the promotion of religion and learning. Let them take the case now before them—not that of fellowships, but that of scholarships and exhibitions from schools. There might be certain schools containing a large number of scholars who were perfectly fit to compete for the exhibitions to scholarships at the University; but the number of boys might also be so small that a sufficient number could not be furnished who were able to obtain the fellowships that were by law assigned to them. Was the inferior person in that case to be preferred, and the young man of talent set aside? He owned it appeared to him that, if they gave the preference to fitness, they could not adopt the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman. The question had been placed upon a very different ground by the hon. and learned Gentleman; for he did not say he wished to stand exactly upon the will of the founders, but that they would obtain fitness if they took the scholars from these schools, as the examinations would ascertain whether they were fit for the emoluments which they wished to enjoy. But it was quite clear that if the number of scholars was very limited, they would find that these examinations would only ascertain a very low degree of competence, a very narrow standard of learning, and their general object would thereby be defeated. He hoped, therefore, the House would reject the hon. and learned Gentleman's proposition and agree to the Amendment of the Lords.

MR. WIGRAM said, he had no wish to use such harsh words as plunder and spoliation; but he must say, that if the clause were passed in its present form, it would enable parties to violate the rules under which property had hitherto been recognised in this country for a very long period. It was a deviation from the principle which the people of this country had long enjoyed, that those who bequeathed property for a particular purpose should have the right of defining the manner in which that property should be disposed of. That was one of the main principles on which all the rights of property were founded, and he trusted the House would not be induced to accede to such a proposition as was now before it, and which would reverse that principle. He denied that the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Roundell Palmer) would in any way be a hindrance to the progress of learning and religion—they had a sufficient number of protections and safeguards to prevent any abuse of that sort. The noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) had argued that they were committed to this course by what they had already done. He could only say that this did not apply to himself, for he had protested against the principle, and had voted against it. But besides this, the present clause went a great deal further than any of the others. Then they were asked by the noble Lord whether they were prepared to adhere to the will^s of the founders, even though those will^s should hinder rather than promote the spread of religion and learning. He denied that they were reduced to this alternative, for even if the words introduced by the House of Lords were omitted, still they would have the fullest opportunity of enacting rules which would secure the advancement of religion and learning. In reply to another case put by the noble Lord President, he would say that in case of schools not sending up persons sufficiently qualified for scholarships, it would be competent for the colleges to reject them, and in that case the appointments would be open. It had been decided in the case of Catherine Hall, Cambridge, that the colleges had the right to refuse the election of incompetent persons. They had, therefore, no temptation to deviate from the principle of respecting the wills of the founders, and he hoped the House would not depart from it.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That this House doth agree with the Lords in the Amendment in page 10, lines 23, 24, and 25, which Amendment was after the word 'and' to insert the words 'in cases where it is proposed by such Regulation or Ordinance to abolish any right of preference in elections to any emolument other than a Fellowship or Studentship.'"

The House divided:—Ayes 110; Noes 68: Majority 42.

Several other Amendments were agreed to without discussion.

In Clause 42, which provides that the Statutes made by the Commissioners with respect to the Hebdomadal Council and the Congregation may be repealed by the University, with the approval of Her Majesty in Council, the Lords had added the words "and respecting private halls."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved that the words "and respecting private halls," which had been added by the Lords, be omitted, as he believed they had been inserted by the Lords per incuriam, and without due consideration. No doubt the intention had been to place their proceedings in regard to private halls on a footing analogous to their proceedings with respect to the Hebdomadal Council and Congregation. With respect to the latter, however, they had provided by the Bill both for their existence and for many details with regard to them; and the present clause provided that the particulars and details of them might be altered by the University with the consent of the Crown.

The House of Lords had assumed that the case was the same with regard to private halls, and that they had provided by the Bill both for their existence and for a number of details respecting them. In place of this, the Bill merely provided for their existence, and laid down no details in relation to them, leaving it to the University to regulate all those details. The only thing, therefore, which would come within the scope of the words, "and respecting private halls," would be the very existence of those halls themselves. He did not think that this could have been the meaning of the House of Lords, and would therefore move that the Amendment be rejected.

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE said, he did not believe that this clause had been inserted by the House of Lords per incuriam. In fact he had raised this very question, and moved an Amendment in these very words when the Bill was formerly before the House. He did so on the ground that this experiment of private halls was one of a very doubtful nature, and that it ought to be competent to the University at some future time to renew and, if necessary, to abolish it. Holding these grounds, he must oppose the Motion that this Amendment of the Lords be rejected.

MR. APSLEY PELLATT said, that if the Amendment were agreed to, the benefits which Dissenters expected to derive from the establishment of private halls would be completely neutralised.

MR. WALPOLE said, he understood the 42nd clause unquestionably to give powers to alter the 27th clause, which established the private halls; but the extreme limitation under which the private halls could be altered ought to be taken into consideration. They can only be altered in case they have completely failed, not merely in the opinion of the governing body, but in the opinion of the members of Convocation resident in the University. But since it was admitted that an experiment was being made, was it not right to leave the University, that was to say the governing body of the University, the powers to give a veto, which were allowed to Convocation, and further powers to prevent the University from hastily exercising their own powers if the University were inclined to do so? Suppose the private halls failed—suppose it became advisable to establish affiliated halls—why was the University to be debarred from superseding the regulations or the provisions which might turn out not only a failure, but detrimental to the best interests of the University. He (Mr. Walpole) trusted that his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not persevere in resisting the Lords' Amendment on this point.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that there were great interests bound up in the establishment and development of private halls, through which medium the great principle of University extension was to be carried out. If the words were not struck out, the great object of the Bill would be entirely nullified, and the Bill itself reduced to a mere temporary provision. This surely was not the intention of the House, neither was it the object of Imperial legislation. The whole Bill proceeded upon the establishment of two great principles. The establishment of private halls was one—the constitution of the University the other; and if any alteration was made with regard to one of these, the other, the constitution of the University, must certainly be subjected to the same rule.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, a restriction was imposed on the Queen in Council with respect to private halls, which did not exist with respect to the University, to the election, constitution, and powers of the Hebdomadal Council, or to the powers of Convocation. If the House would not trust the University, it certainly might trust the Queen in Council. All that the House of Lords had proposed in the Amendment was very obvious. They had said, why should not this experiment be subject to the same provisions as the other parts of the Bill—why should it not be subject to the Queen in Council at the suggestion of the University, in the same way as every other creation in the Bill? It was not to be expected that the House of Lords was likely to pass the Bill with such an anomaly as this, and he did not see why this portion of the Bill, which was avowedly an experiment, should not be subject to the same regulations as the other proposals contained in it.

MR. HENLEY said, that so far as he could understand the Bill it was in a very confused state. It was absolutely necessary that the University should have these powers, and if the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would attend he would show him why. The 30th clause gave powers to the University to make regulations for private halls; the 41st clause gave powers to the University to alter anything that they had done themselves; and the 39th section of the Bill gave powers to the Commissioners to frame Statutes, in the case of the private halls, to carry out any of the provisions with respect to which the University had made a default. But if these Statutes, after working five or six years, were found to contain inconvenient regulations respecting the matters to be observed in these private halls, surely the right hon. Gentleman did not say that these were to be law for ever. If they were matters of two grave a kind for powers to be given to the University, he (Mr. Henley) considered that the Queen in Council was a sufficient check. If the University did not see its way clearly to establish these halls, and left them to be established by the Commissioners, and the Commissioners having made these regulations, there would be no power to alter them at any future period, however inconvenient they might be.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, the meaning of the words as regarded the Statutes made by the Commissioners was, that they should be subject to revisal and alteration by the parties who created the private halls, and if the regulations with regard to private halls should be found upon experience to be inconvenient, there was full power under the Bill to alter them. What he wished should not be altered, however, was the provision of the Bill with respect to the establishment of those halls.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That this House doth disagree with The Lords in the Amendment in page 14, lines 7 and 8, which Amendment was, after the word 'Congregation,' to insert the words 'and respecting private Halls.'"

The House divided:—Ayes 130; Noes 70: Majority 60.

On the 46th clause, which provides that no oath should be necessary on taking a degree, the House of Lords had inserted the following proviso—

"But such degree shall not as such constitute any qualification for the holding of any office which has been heretofore always held by a member of the United Church of England and Ireland, and for which such degree in the said University has heretofore constituted one of the qualifications, unless the person obtaining such degree shall have taken such oaths, and subscribed such declarations, as are not by law required to be made and taken on obtaining such degree, either at the time of taking such degree or subsequently."

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to ask the noble Lord opposite two questions. The first was, why should not young men entering the University be called upon to make a declaration of their belief? He could not for a moment imagine why this was abolished. It could only be to enable foreigners to become Members. He well knew that the House of Lords were extremely liberal in their accommodations for the reception of distinguished foreigners, of which they had lately had an instance in the case of Count Pahlen; but he certainly did hope that there would be no young Pahlens (especially at the present time) found in our Universities. The second question he would ask was as to the meaning of the word "office." It was not in the interpretation clause; and he wished to know whether a fellowship was to be construed as an office within the meaning of that clause?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, according to his apprehension the word "office" did not include "fellowship," although, in certain cases, a fellowship might have attached to it some particular office. "Office" and "emolument" were quite distinct, and in his opinion, the word "office" could not include either fellowship or emolument.

MR. HRYWOOD said, he believed that the words alluded to by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) were intended to apply to the masters of grammar schools. He did not, for his own part, agree with the proviso at all, and he could not consider the matter settled so long as it remained upon the Statute-book, but he believed that it expressed the present opinion of the other House of Parliament upon the subject, and he had no wish at this period of the Session to raise a difficulty about it. Sir Robert Peel, in the year 1834, in speaking upon this subject, had said—

"The Dissenters at the Universities never would remain contented with the mere empty degree of master of arts, but would continue to strive after—nay, peremptorily to demand—a perfect equality in all things not necessarily connected with ecclesiastical affairs. He would put the case of two students intending to enter upon the profession of the law, the one a Dissenter, the other a member of the Church of England; either might have, he would suppose, a lay fellowship, if the religious scruples of one of them had not happened to stand in the way. The Dissenter might stand more in need of such fellowship. He would then put it to the right hon. Gentleman to say how he could, upon his own principles, refuse the claim of the Dissenter to a collegiate advantage not necessarily connected with ecclesiastical affairs? By what right could he establish such an invidious distinction on a matter merely of civil benefit and advantage? To his mind, it did appear infinitely more rational and consistent to proceed according to the recommendation of the hon. Member for Leeds, and grant to the Dissenters a full and equal participation in all the advantages of the Universities not necessarily of an ecclesiastical or spiritual character."—[3 Hansard, xxiv. 708.]

He must say that he (Mr. Heywood) should very much have preferred that Parliament should have arrived at this, which was called by Sir Robert Peel "an infinitely more sound and rational conclusion" than that this proviso should have been introduced for the purpose of pushing out or keeping out Dissenters from the master-ships of grammar schools. He was not at all satisfied with the matter as it stood; but he repeated that he would not at present make any opposition to the Amendment.

Mr. GOULBURN said, he thought that, when the hon. Member for North Lancashire cited the opinion of Sir Robert Peel upon this subject, it was as well the House should know that upon the very occasion on which he had made that speech—in which he was arguing against the views of his opponents, and showing to what consequences they would lead—his vote, as they would see if they referred to it, had been given against the proposition to admit Dissenters to the Universities.

Mr. HENLEY said, he understood that the language of Sir Robert Peel, which had been referred to by the hon. Member for North Lancashire, had not been cited by him for the purpose of informing the House of the opinions held by Sir Robert Peel on the subject of admitting Dissenters to the Universities, but had been read for the knowledge of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), and of other Gentlemen who sat near him, and in order to show them that what they had now done had established an irresistible claim upon the part of the Dissenters to have everything else they desired. He understood that that quotation expressed Sir Robert Peel's opinion, then speaking upon this very subject—that if what was then asked should be conceded, which was something very like what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had been instrumental in carrying now, the Dissenters would have in that concession an irresistible argument for demanding everything else. Now, with respect to this proviso, it appeared to him that the only effect of it would be to strike at the schoolmasters; and that while it would shut out the Protestant Dissenters to a man, Roman Catholics would be let in by it. It applied to "any office which has been heretofore always held by a member of the United Church of England and Ireland." Now, many of these schools had, no doubt, been formerly held by Roman Catholics; and, therefore, the effect of this concoction by the Dissenting body on the one hand, and the right hon. Gentleman on the other, would be, that no Protestant Dissenter could benefit—that it was possible that Church of England schoolmasters might be shut out—and that Roman Catholics alone would derive any advantage.

Mr. ROUNDELL PALMER said, he did not think that the right hon. Gentleman's apprehension with respect to Roman Catholics was very well founded; but he admitted that the clause was very oddly worded. He believed that the "United Church of England and Ireland" had only existed since the Act of Union, and it would be obvious that, if that were so, hardly any office could be said to have been "heretofore always held" by a member of that Church; but, of course, a court of law would give a rational interpretation to the clause.

The Lords' Amendment agreed to.

Mr. CRAUFURD said, he would now move to restore the 47th clause, which provided that no member on account of his rank should be permitted to take his degree sooner than any other undergraduate.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought the hon. Gentleman was applying his Cambridge experience to the case of the University of Oxford, whereas the systems at the two Universities were entirely different. At Oxford there was no distinction made in the examinations on account of difference of birth. The clause had been introduced on the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Leominster (Mr. J. G. Phillimore), and no great question had been made about it at the time, but there was really this serious objection to it—that it referred to a matter of detail, and that, if they took upon themselves to legislate upon such a matter, they would be making themselves responsible, in effect, for a great number of other details which they might think ought to be amended. He thought, therefore, that the safer course would be to leave this, as they had left a great many other matters, to be dealt with by the University itself.

On the 50th clause (saving the powers and privileges of the University and its officers, except in so far as they are expressly altered or taken away by the provisions of this Act).

Mr. BLACKETT said he wished to call attention to the subject of the Vice Chancellor's veto. When the measures to be submitted to Convocation emanated from the Hebdomadal Board, with which body the Vice Chancellor was constantly in harmony, there was no danger that the veto would be mischievously exercised in reference to those measures. But at present, for the Hebdomadal Board they had substituted a Hebdomadal Council, with whom there was no reason to suppose, but the contrary, that the Vice Chancellor would always act in harmony. It was a matter, therefore, of the greatest importance that the Vice Chancellor should not have power to interpose and neutralise the proceedings of the Hebdomadal Council, by vetoing those proceedings when submitted to Convocation. When he had spoken to the hon. and learned Solicitor General some time since upon the subject, the hon. and learned Gentleman had expressed his opinion that the veto of the Vice Chancellor was taken away by the operation of the clause which was now the 19th in the Bill. He therefore wished to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman now, whether the stringent words substituted would have the effect of maintaining the veto of the Vice Chancellor on all proceedings connected with Convocation, which it was formerly his opinion had been abrogated by the 19th clause, or whether he considered that it would be taken away in spite of the stringent words introduced by the House of Lords?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, it was provided by the 19th clause that every Statute framed by the Hebdomadal Council should first be submitted to Congregation, and afterwards to Convocation; and, in his opinion, the exercise of the veto was, by that provision, effectually restrained.

Amendment agreed to.

Committee appointed to draw up Reasons to be assigned to the Lords for disagreeing to the Amendments to which this House hath disagreed.

THE BISHOP OF NEW ZEALAND.

Order read for going into Committee of Supply.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, in calling the attention of the House to the case of the Bishop of New Zealand, he begged to observe that when he had complained on a former occasion of the withdrawal of the grant to the Bishop, he was told there was nothing new in it, as the grant had been stopped in 1853. He then inquired if any despatch had been sent out either to the Bishop of New Zealand or to the Governor of New Zealand to state the intention of the Government to withdraw the grant, or to state the fact that it had been withdrawn, and the answer of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir G. Grey) was, that no such information had been sent to either of these parties. In the year 1853 the income which the Bishop had received from the time of his appointment was withdrawn, without the slightest intimation being sent of the intention either to the Bishop or to the Governor of New Zealand. He would say nothing of the position of the Bishop of New Zealand, of his exemplary character, and great and admitted capacity. He would assume for a moment that instead of being a bishop of the Church of England he was the lowest official of the smallest colony, and he (Sir J. Pakington) would ask the House whether in the case of any public servant, be he who he may, it was consistent with good faith and fair dealing, that an allowance once granted by Parliament, and on the faith of which that public servant had gone out to the Colony, should be so withdrawn. Putting the case in that way to the House, he begged to say distinctly that he did not intend to make any accusation against the Duke of Newcastle, the Secretary of State who arranged the matter. He was quite sure that the Duke of Newcastle was as little inclined as any one could be to do anything unfair towards any public servant connected with his department, and more especially one holding the high position of the Bishop of New Zealand. He might add, that he knew too much of the Colonial Office to feel surprised that occasional mistakes of that kind should arise, and he could only suppose that this was a mistake, and that in withdrawing this grant from the Estimates of 1853, without the slightest warning to the Bishop, the Duke of Newcastle had acted inadvertently, and in that view he looked to its speedy and effectual rectification. He (Sir J. Pakington) would not advert to the attempt that had been made to throw the blame of this upon him. He could only say that he felt extremely innocent on the subject. It was true that in the year 1852, he expressed a hope that after two years New Zealand would cease to be a charge upon this country. Perhaps he had not been so cautious in making a distinct exception with regard to the salary of the Bishop as he should have been, but nothing would induce him to be a party to such a withdrawal of the grant as had actually taken place, and that without due notice. He would remind any hon. Gentleman who attempted to throw blame on him of the fact that it was stopped in 1853 without any warning or notice, and, at all events, he was innocent of that, because it did not devolve on him to send out notice. But if hon. Gentlemen thought he was to blame, he was willing to bear his share of it, but he would not be a party to stopping the grant under such circumstances. In a letter written by the Under Secretary for the Colonies, by the direction of the right hon. Baronet (Sir G. Grey), it was stated that, until it had appeared incidentally, the Governor was under the impression that the Vote for the salary of 600*l.* had been continued. Now, he appealed to the right hon. Gentleman if those words did not establish his (Sir J. Pakington's) case? Why was the Governor under the impression, or how did he discover it incidentally? If the intention had been courteously communicated, no such erroneous impression would have existed. The right hon. Gentleman then proceeded to say that the Estimate of 1853 had been diminished by previous engagements to 5,090*l.*, and he (Sir J. Pakington) must beg to correct the right hon. Gentleman with respect to that passage of his letter. The right hon. Gentleman would not find that anything that had been said by him would render it necessary to reduce the grant in 1853 to 5,090*l.* He (Sir J. Pakington) had talked of gradual reduction, but said nothing with respect to the reduction of the grant to that amount. He then said the salary of the Bishop, with other items, was omitted, but he gave no reason why they were omitted. It was perfectly clear from those extracts that the right hon. Gentleman did not intend to give any reason for the withdrawal of the salary. His letter to the Bishop was, of course, worded very politely, but the real substance of it was, "I am sorry to say that I have to inform you that your salary is stopped." To this letter the Bishop sent an answer. It was written in a calm and dignified tone, and he made no complaint; and if there was anything like severity in the letter, it was only the severity that was inseparable from the nature of these unfortunate circumstances. The Bishop stated the facts on which the question mainly turned. The salary was taken away by the Government in 1853, and he never received any notice of the fact until the 25th of June, 1854. It was true that the noble Lord opposite (Lord J. Russell), who was Colonial Minister when the arrangement respecting the bishopric was originally made, had said that he would not be responsible for the permanence of the salary. But in saying that the noble Lord could only mean one of two things—first, that he would not answer for Parliament being always disposed to continue this grant, and that at some future day the income of the bishopric might be transferred from the Parliamentary grant to some other source. He (Sir J. Pakington) did not believe the noble Lord had intended to intimate to the Bishop the possibility that he, the very Minister who made the arrangement, would turn round on the Bishop and say his income was to be taken away without any warning, or any provision being made for it elsewhere. It was well known that the Bishop of New Zealand did not desire income for income's sake. He bestowed his income in a manner that was worthy of a Bishop of the Church. He bestowed it with liberality and generosity, and from the fact of his devoting his income to the benefit of his fellow-Christians, and never making it a source of profit to himself, he might have been exposed on receiving this intimation to the want of pecuniary means. He (Sir J. Pakington) did not affirm that the salary of the Bishop of New Zealand was to be a permanent charge on the funds of the country. He thought it might be desirable to do in that case as had been done in others, and transfer it to some other source; but until they had done so, they were bound in good faith, and by a regard for the dignity and welfare of the Church, to continue that salary until they had otherwise provided for it. He asked the noble Lord the Lord President of the Council, and the right hon. Gentleman who filled the office of Secretary of State for the Colonies, whether it had not been the uniform policy of successive Administrations in this country to increase the episcopacy in Colonies; and it was also their uniform policy never to allow the establishment of a new bishopric until a sufficient endowment was provided. Did it not follow from that that it was the uniform opinion of successive Governments that it was absolutely necessary that those who held the office of bishops in the Colonies should be properly provided for, and if it were opposed to that policy, to establish a bishopric until an endowment was found, it was equally opposed to it to leave this bishopric destitute. Before placing his Motion in Mr. Speaker's hands, he would confess that he entertained the most sanguine hope that the Government would admit, whomever the blame might rest upon, that his proposition should be acceded to, and it should be recollected that the salary was stopped by an act of the Government, and not by the act of the House of Commons. It was stopped, he believed, under a misapprehension, and he hoped Her Majesty's Government would not resist his application. In conclusion, he begged to propose the Motion of which he had given notice.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words—

"This House will To-morrow resolve itself into a Committee to consider of presenting an humble Address to Her Majesty, praying that She may be graciously pleased to give directions that the Salary of £600. heretofore voted annually to the Lord Bishop of New Zealand shall be paid for the years 1853 and 1854; and assuring Her Majesty that this House will make good the same."

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that this grant of late years had been allowed to pass upon the distinct understanding that it would be gradually reduced and ultimately withdrawn altogether. When the grant was last before the House, he threatened to divide upon it, but upon receiving a distinct pledge that it would not be resumed he did not persevere in his intention, and the grant was allowed to pass. Under these circumstances he contended that it would be a breach of faith to Parliament if this Motion were agreed to. Upon what principle of common justice or common honesty could the right hon. Baronet expect this country to support a Bishop of New Zealand? If the Colony wanted a bishop the Colony was well able to support one; on the other hand, if the Colony did not want one, let the right rev. Prelate withdraw from it.

SIR THOMAS ACLAND said, he

trusted the Government would not oppose this act, he would not say of grace, but of justice and common fairness. It was now twelve or fourteen years since that House, by a distinct vote, without any qualification, had sent out this most distinguished man to the diocese of New Zealand, and certainly at that time there was not the slightest intimation held out that his stipend would ever be thus summarily withdrawn. When the Vote originally appeared in the Estimates, it appeared not as a charge relating to the colony of New Zealand, but as an item in the Estimate for the ecclesiastical and clerical charge of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Zealand, and several years elapsed before it appeared in its present form. But some time afterwards it was presented in a different form, and it became liable to the grave consideration whether, generally speaking, the provision for the prelates of the Church in the colony should be made by the colony or by this country. As regarded the ecclesiastical salaries of Canada and Nova Scotia, they still continued to be voted by Parliament during the lives of the present recipients. The salary of this Bishop belonged to the same class; and in their Report the Committee on the Miscellaneous Estimates, which sat five or six years ago, stated that they declined to enter into the consideration of salaries belonging to this category, because they would lapse altogether with the lives of the life-holders. Well, this admirable Prelate had gone forth to a remote colony to discharge most important Christian duties there, never dreaming that he would receive treatment such as was now suggested, and which he (Sir T. Acland) could hardly trust himself to characterise as it deserved. It was not merely the bounty of Parliament that was asked for him, but rather what was justly due, on the principle that the labourer was worthy of his hire. The Bishop of New Zealand had helped to prepare in those islands a state of society in which was exhibited perhaps the most remarkable instance ever known of the bringing of a numerous and high-spirited native population into full union and sympathy with a Christian country to whom they had become subject. This the right rev. Prelate had done in a manner that deserved the highest consideration on their part; and he (Sir T. Acland) felt assured that that House would not refuse the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Pakington), and which he sincerely trusted would meet with no opposition from any Member of the Government.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that, having answered various questions that had been put to him recently on this subject, and correspondence relating to it having been produced, the facts of this case were already sufficiently known to the House, and it was therefore unnecessary for him now to reiterate them. Neither was it needful that he should repeat his entire concurrence in the eulogiums that had been passed upon the excellence, the zeal, and the ability of the Bishop of New Zealand. He believed the appointment of that Prelate by his noble Friend (Lord J. Russell), in 1839, to the diocese which he had now for many years occupied had been productive of the greatest benefits to New Zealand and the neighbouring islands, and especially to the native races inhabiting them. With regard to this salary itself, he must say, that although it was originally proposed in the manner stated by his hon. Friend the Member for North Devonshire (Sir T. Acland), not as a salary for New Zealand alone, but in common with the ecclesiastical salaries voted for different parts of our Colonies, yet this arose from the circumstance that there used to be no Vote for New Zealand asked from Parliament, and as soon as a Vote came to be required for the civil service of that Colony, the Bishop's income of 600*l.* formed a part of it. The Vote was justified on the ground that in an infant colony like New Zealand the local resources were not sufficient to meet the exigencies of the settlement, and, therefore, the aid of Parliament was invoked in its behalf. Thus the Vote was continued from year to year, till in 1851 a despatch was addressed to the Secretary of State by the Governor of New Zealand, describing the financial condition and prospects of the Colony, and stating that if 10,000*l.* was voted in 1852 by Parliament in aid of the colonial revenues, in 1853 the Vote might be reduced to 5,000*l.*, after which he thought no further help would be asked from the British Parliament in aid of the finances of the Colony. He (Sir G. Grey) thought the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Pakington) would find, independently of what he was reported to have stated to the House at the time, that a note was appended to the Estimates for 1852 (which were prepared under the direction of the right hon. Gentleman), in which it was stated, in accordance with the opinion of the Governor, that if

10,000*l.* was granted in 1852, a sum of about 5,000*l.* would be all that would be required in 1853, after which no further Vote would be required for the civil services in New Zealand; and he (Sir G. Grey) found, on looking over the records, that when the Vote of 1852 was objected to on the specific ground that it contained 600*l.* for the Bishop, the right hon. Gentleman rose and said that after 1853 nothing more would be required on account of the civil service of New Zealand, making no exception of the Bishop's salary, so that the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. Williams) was entitled to express himself as he had done, because he had been induced to withdraw his opposition to the Vote on that occasion by reason of the statement of the right hon. Gentleman. But it seemed now that the right hon. Gentleman intended to except from that general statement this 600*l.* a year; but he thought it was the right hon. Gentleman himself who ought in 1852 to have addressed a despatch to the Governor, informing him that he had stated in the House of Commons that no Vote would be brought forward again, and suggesting to him that proper means should be taken for providing this sum from the resources of the Colony. No such intimation, however, was conveyed by the right hon. Gentleman, and next year, when the Vote was discontinued—no doubt it might have been from accident or inadvertence on the part of the right hon. Gentleman—no direct communication was made to the Governor or to the Bishop of the actual cessation of the Vote. The right hon. Gentleman was wrong in saying that no intimation of any kind had been sent to the Colony, because, as he had informed the right hon. Gentleman, in answer to a question that had been put to him, the Estimate itself had been sent to the Colony, and the inspection of it would at once show that the salary had been withdrawn. Yet, owing to there having been no previous communication to the Governor on the subject, either from the right hon. Gentleman or from the Duke of Newcastle, the 600*l.* had been actually paid to the Bishop in the Colony for the year 1853, so that the alleged sudden stoppage was no sudden stoppage at all; and in point of fact the salary had only ceased from March, 1854. The Bishop certainly, however, had no intimation of this cessation, and he (Sir G. Grey) had received a despatch from the Governor, as if the salary were still payable. The House must be aware that he had nothing to do with the occurrences to which he had adverted; but upon learning these facts, he thought it right to communicate immediately with the acting Governor, and desire that he would take steps, without delay, to induce the authorities in the Colony to provide for the salary of the Bishop from the time it had actually ceased. If it should appear that the payment to the Bishop of the salary of 1853 was an illegal payment, and that there existed any claim upon him in respect to that salary, he (Sir G. Grey) was willing at once to express his opinion that this was a claim to which the Bishop ought not to be liable, and the House, he thought, ought to be called upon to make good such a demand. So, with regard to the year 1854, to which the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman was limited, he was prepared to say that, if the Bishop had been put to inconvenience—which it was impossible he should not have been put to from the sudden withdrawal of the salary and the absence of all notice—and if the appeal to the Assembly of New Zealand was not successful, then this House ought, he thought, to make good the salary for that period also. They were not, however, in a condition now to determine that question. The Bishop had received his salary for 1853, and he hoped the appeal to the Assembly of New Zealand would be productive of a good effect, and that it would be unnecessary to call upon this House to make good his salary. With regard to these two years the Bishop had a claim upon the Colony, and that was a claim which the Government would very willingly recognise, in the event of the Assembly not taking it upon themselves to meet it.

MR. ROUNDELL PALMER said, that, although the right hon. Colonial Secretary had, with respect to these two years' salary, said everything which could be wished for, an important principle was involved in this case, to which it was right the attention of the House should be called. The House should consider in what position any bishop or clergyman sent out would be placed if an appointment of this nature were made, fixing on a person an office of which he could be divested, and if the salary which had been accorded to him was then suddenly discontinued. It seemed to him that the Government of this country, assenting to the appointment of a bishop, and leading him to the expectation that his salary would be provided for by Parliament, were bound, so far as that individual was concerned, to continue to provide for him that salary during the whole of the time he might continue to retain that position, in default of such a provision being forthcoming from any other quarter. In the absence of any disposition on the part of the Colonial Assembly to take upon themselves this charge, it appeared to him that it would be a most undignified and unworthy course of proceeding for this country to send out to a colony a person in an ecclesiastical situation, teaching him to rely upon the provision made by the Legislature for his annual support, and then to put the matter on a new footing, and say that if the Colonial Legislature did not take the charge of paying this salary the Bishop would have to go without his stipend. It was his conviction, that it would be the duty of this House to provide permanently for the salary of the Bishop if the Colonial Legislature did not do so. This was no colonial question, but a question simply concerning the honour and the good faith of the Imperial Parliament.

MR. HADFIELD said, that after the statement they had heard from the right hon. Baronet (Sir G. Grey), the House had nothing to deliberate upon. If the Bishop of New Zealand were the excellent man he was represented to be, and he did not doubt that he was, why did not the denomination to which he belonged enter into a subscription amongst themselves for the purpose of raising the money necessary for his support, without coming and asking the House of Commons to do it for them. This was not the place to grant money for religious purposes. Let the prosperous colonies connected with this country maintain their own religious establishments, in the same manner that the majority of the people of England now did theirs.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM said, in reply to the hon. Member who had last addressed them, that the Bishop had expressed his determination to return to New Zealand, whether his income was secured to him or not, and there maintain himself by digging or begging in the best way he could.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that after the statement that had been made by the right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary, he should not persevere in his Motion.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—MISCELLANEOUS ESTIMATES.

House in Committee of Supply.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding 140,000*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, for the purchase of Burlington House and Grounds, Piccadilly, in the year ending the 31st day of March, 1855."

MR. SPOONER said, that up to the present moment the House had received no information as to what was to be done with the purchase of land at Kensington, and they ought, therefore, to pause in granting this additional sum of money for the purchase of Burlington House until they had had some specific plans and estimates laid before them. The sum voted for the Kensington estate was 200,000*l.*, and the 140,000*l.* now proposed, was merely for the purchase of the site upon which Burlington House stood, and the Committee was in utter ignorance with regard to the expenses which were to be incurred in building on those sites. When last the subject was discussed, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or the Secretary to the Treasury, stated that the cheapest way of dealing with Burlington House was to pull it down. So that, according to this suggestion, the nation was about to pay the sum of 140,000*l.* merely for the space upon which the house stood, and the old materials. With the example they had before them in the building in which they were then assembled, the first estimate for the erection of which was 700,000*l.*, whereas 2,500,000*l.* had been expended, whilst it was a very great way from being finished, he did think the Committee ought to be careful and cautious in what they did, and not incur further expenditure. Unless some satisfactory explanation were given, he should take the sense of the Committee against the Vote.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he understood at first that Burlington House was to be purchased for public offices. He thought it was very inconveniently situate for such a purpose. If land were wanted, why was not use made of the waste piece of ground at the end of Downing Street? That could be had for nothing. There was also public property lying waste in the rear of Somerset House. It appeared, however, that in truth it was wanted not for public offices, but for the accommodation of certain scientific societies. This was the second call which had been made on the nation in connection with the Exhibition of 1851, which thus promised to be a very expensive affair to the country. He should have thought that the splendid success of the Crystal Palace at Sydenham would have convinced the Government that such matters as this were best left to private enterprise. If the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Spooner) would divide the Committee on this Vote, he would cordially join him.

CAPTAIN SCOBELL said, he presumed that, as Government came to the House of Commons to ask for the money to purchase Burlington House, they had not yet made the bargain. He agreed with what had fallen from the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner) and the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. W. Williams), and he could not help thinking that, if Burlington House was to come down, we were merely purchasing about three acres of land, for which we were going to pay 50,000*l.* an acre. He did not think that the present times justified such an expense being incurred for so small a return. As to the space being used for the erection of buildings for private societies, he thought such a proceeding was not necessary, and he believed that these societies could erect their own buildings at a much less cost than Government would be likely to do it for them.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, he believed, on the contrary, that the estimate was extremely economical. He might state to the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner) what might perhaps lessen his objection to the Vote, namely, that he had heard it reported that if the Government did not buy the site of Burlington House for this purpose, it was the intention of the Roman Catholics to purchase it, and build a large cathedral upon it. He (Mr. M. Milnes) could not agree with those hon. Members who spoke slightly of scientific societies, for he considered that the country was under great obligations to them. He certainly trusted that the Government would not pull down Burlington House, for it was one of the finest specimens of its style in England.

MR. BANKES said, he objected to the grant on every ground, but one of his chief reasons for opposing it was, that the present beautiful structure would be pulled down. Next to the fine specimen of Inigo Jones at Whitehall, Burlington House would be one of the greatest ornaments to the metropolis, if it could be seen, and the only thing which could reconcile him to the Vote was the pulling down of the exterior wall in Piccadilly, and opening the building to the public view. He also thought that the present was an unsuitable time for that House to be asked for a Vote of this description, and he saw no reason why, because they were called upon to vote millions, they should not look after the thousands and tens of thousands.

Mr. HEYWOOD said, that the Presidents of the different scientific societies had had a meeting the other day, and had all agreed that the purchase was desirable, and were obliged to the Government for proposing to buy it. Some of those societies had a fair claim on the Government for a location, as some of them had originally been provided with rooms in our public buildings.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he could not well understand the arguments made use of by the hon. Member for Dorsetshire (Mr. Bankes). That hon. Gentleman stated that his objection to this Vote would be either withdrawn or greatly modified if it were proposed to pull down the wall in front of Burlington House; and, having made that statement, he proceeded to say that, at the present time, it was absolutely necessary, on account of the war, to refrain from applying to Parliament for money to be expended for a purpose not absolutely necessary. He could not understand how those two arguments could hang together, nor could he admit that either was tenable. The proposition for pulling down the wall, and so opening the view to Burlington House, was a proposition not to be endured—"Oh, oh!"—that was to say, not to be endured by those who were intrusted with the management of the public resources at the present time; and, on the other hand, he protested against the doctrine, that the country was so reduced in means that no money could be voted except for purposes of what might be called absolute necessity. With respect to the acquisition of three acres and a half of land at a price which every one must admit was by no means extravagant, in the very heart of London, in a most commanding situation, in a great thoroughfare, he could only say that, if the opportunity were allowed to pass, it might be many generations before such another occurred, and in the forty or fifty years which might elapse before such an opportunity occurred, in what way could the public demands for space be met? What was to be done with the institutions, and the objects of interest which would have to be removed from Marlborough House in a few years, when that house was given up? It would be cheaper to devote the rooms in Somerset House to offices, than to build new offices at a distance. With regard to the statement that scientific societies could furnish themselves with room at a cheaper rate than the Government could provide it for them, he must say that he could not agree to that statement; because, if they were provided with space in any Government building, other parts of the building, which would be useless to them, could be turned to account by the Government. The difficulty which those societies met with in obtaining accommodation was the difficulty of procuring a large room for their meetings, but if they were provided with space by the public, one large room would be sufficient to answer the requirements of all. The hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. W. Williams) had spoken of the vacant space in Downing Street; but that site was wanted for other purposes. The position of the great State offices in Downing Street was absolutely disgraceful. Some of them were even dangerous, and others inconvenient in the highest degree, and it had become a matter of necessity that they should think of an alteration and enlargement of those offices on a great scale. For such purposes the vacant space in Downing Street would naturally be required. To transfer any of the great offices of State to Burlington House would be altogether inconvenient, and it was important they should all be centred in the neighbourhood of Downing Street. But for Commissioners' offices and establishments of that kind, Burlington House would be found exceedingly convenient, and he therefore thought that for such purposes the proposed arrangement was an excellent one. He hoped, therefore, that the present question would not be mixed up with the one about Kensington, or in any way confounded with the question of the National Gallery, which had been discussed and settled, as was understood, conclusively, in the course of last Session.

Mr. DISRAELI said, there could be no doubt of the soundness of the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman, that nothing could be more valuable, or rather invaluable, to the Government of this country than those spaces of ground that from time to time might be procured in the metropolis. But, before he adverted to that subject, he would venture to make a remark on one or two observations that had fallen from some hon. Gentlemen opposite. The hon. Member for Lambeth had commented on the propriety of some alterations in Somerset House, for which he (Mr. Disraeli) was responsible, and in some measure he approved of what had taken place. He was quite prepared to show, if it was necessary to go into the question, that those alterations were all for the convenience of the public service, as well as economical in so far as regarded the public expenditure, and that, in so far as the management of the Duchy of Cornwall was concerned, the alterations were unquestionably all in favour of the public. So far, indeed, from there being anything like a suspicion of what was called "a job" in this matter, the Duchy of Cornwall would have been perfectly satisfied to remain in their old quarters. The hon. and gallant Member for Bath (Captain Scobell) had made one of those, he might say, habitual attacks on purchases that were so common in that House, and on a former occasion had found fault with the purchase at Kensington Gore on account of its expense. He then stated that 200,000*l.* had been paid for twenty acres of land, whereas the fact was, that it was not twenty, but ninety acres of land that were purchased; and, therefore, when the hon. and gallant Member for Bath wished to establish his reputation for economy, and made his attacks on these purchases, he ought to be more statistically correct in his figures. Neither could he agree with the hon. and gallant Captain, that the site of Burlington House was eminently qualified for a National Gallery. Before they determined what was a good site for a National Gallery, they should come to a conclusion as to what was meant by a National Gallery. He thought that the present National Gallery was the greatest disgrace that existed in this country, and he would much sooner there was no institution bearing the name than that the small collection in the present institution should be where it now was in this metropolis. In his mind, the site of Kensington, which had been recommended by a Committee of that House, was not too small for a National Gallery, a great palace of art, worthy of this nation, and he earnestly hoped no attempt would again be made to raise a National Gallery, such as a National Gallery ought to be, unless they attempted to do something really worthy of the country and the subject. There was nothing on this question so important as that which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had so strongly impressed on the House, of every existing Government seizing upon every opportunity that presented itself of purchasing such spaces of ground in the metropolis as might be thrown upon the market. It was absolutely necessary to avail themselves of these opportunities of promoting the public service, and that in no niggardly spirit. It was of the utmost importance that they should have more accommodation for the public offices, and it was hardly less important that the public servants should be as much as possible brought together by the contiguity of the offices in which they were placed. Indeed, contiguity was, to a certain degree, as valuable as additional space. For these reasons, if the Government recommended the purchase of those three acres and a half of ground at Burlington House, he would be prepared to support them. But there was one point on which he wanted some information. He was himself so impressed with these feelings when in office that when a distinguished nobleman, who held a Crown lease which was about to cease, wished to have that lease renewed, the Board of Treasury, of which he was a member, refused the renewal. Application was made to have the lease of Montagu House renewed by the Duke of Buccleuch, a nobleman who was respected by every Member of that House; but it appeared to the Treasury that the claims of the public service were so paramount that they were not at liberty to renew the lease. On that occasion he felt it his duty, remembering that Montagu House stood in the immediate vicinity of the public offices in Downing Street and Whitehall, to retain the site for the use of the public; but no sooner was he out of office than that decision of the Board of Treasury was rescinded, and the lease of Montagu House was renewed to the same distinguished nobleman he had already referred to. Although he was fully prepared to support the purchase of Burlington House, because he thought it conducive to the public good, still, he thought, for the reasons expressed by the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself, he ought not to have rescinded the resolution arrived at by his predecessor with respect to Montagu House, and that that very important and valuable site should have been preserved for the public use.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the latter point adverted to by the right hon. Gentleman required an explanation. As he understood that statement, the right hon. Gentleman said, that at the time he left office, the renewal of the lease of Montagu House to the Duke of Buccleuch had been refused, but that on the coming of Lord Aberdeen's Government into office, they had granted what had been refused by the previous Ministry. The subject had not been brought before him for some time, and he would not now enter into details on the subject; but he would frankly own that the right hon. Gentleman was quite right in calling attention to the matter, for he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) was distinctly of opinion that an error had been committed in renewing the lease in question. With respect, however, to the time at which, and the persons by whom the error had been committed, he would not now say anything, as it was capable of being shown by full documentary evidence. He thought, therefore, it would be better, with the leave of the Committee, to allow the matter to stand over till the earliest period at which these documents could be produced. For once the right hon. Gentleman and himself were happily agreed as regarded opinions and principles, but with regard to terms he was afraid that they would not be so much of one mind. If the Committee would allow him to look up the documents, there should be an opportunity of their coming to a full judgment on all the facts of the case.

MR. SPOONER said, he must confess, that what had fallen from his right hon. Friend (Mr. Disraeli) had made him more determined to take the sense of the Committee upon this Vote. Instead of taking this grant for Burlington House, he would venture to recommend to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to sell the property at Kensington. It appeared to him (Mr. Spooner) that there was some secret about the Kensington property which he thought ought to be unravelled, for it was impossible that ninety acres of land could be required for a National Gallery. He could give no better name to this matter than that it was an extravagant job.

MR. DEEDES said, he wished to know whether it was the intention of the Government, if they purchased this property, to pull down the building?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that he thought it would be an unreasonable and extravagant application of the ground to keep the house standing; but it was premature for them at present to come to any decision upon this point.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought that the purchase of the ground in the present case was a good bargain, but he must beg to say that his approval of this did not bind him to sanction any scheme the Government might bring forward with reference to this ground.

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH said, that when the plans had been prepared, an opportunity would be afforded the House of fully expressing an opinion on them.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 143; Noes 23: Majority 120.

(4.) 10,000*l.* New Consular Offices, &c. Constantinople.

LORD DUDLEY STUART said, he objected to the form in which the Vote had been placed upon the Estimates, inasmuch as no information was afforded as to what amount of money was to be expended under each of the heads to which the Vote was to be applied. So far as the item relating to the hospital was concerned, he could only say that nothing could be more necessary than the erection of such a building. A medical officer, residing at Constantinople, had borne testimony to the inadequate provision at present made in that capital for the relief of such of our seamen as might be attacked by illness. The gentleman to whom he referred stated that the present hospital was much too small; that it was impregnated with filth of every description; that it afforded no means of effecting a separation between those who were afflicted with infectious diseases, and those who were not; that the diet provided for the sick was insufficient in quantity and bad in quality; that there was no surgical apparatus kept in the hospital with the exception of a few splints; and, in short, those unfortunate patients who were placed there while suffering under severe illness, had but a very small chance of recovery. Such was the accommodation that was provided for our poor merchant seamen; and he having himself seen the hospital, was bound to say that the description given of it by the medical officer whose statement he had just quoted by no means exceeded reality. Notwithstanding, however, the nature of the accommodation, those who were forced to become inmates of the hospital in question were obliged to pay out of their wages sums which, regard being had to the character of the relief which they received, were enormous. The French hospital at Constantinople presented the greatest possible contrast to the English hospital, and both by day and night the sick in it were carefully attended to by those estimable women, the Sisters of Charity, and paid only one-third of the amount exacted from the English seamen in the British hospital. When in Constantinople, he told Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, who out of his own private resources contributed munificently to the charity, that he had been requested to bring the state of the hospital under the notice of the House of Commons, and that noble Lord expressed a hope that he (Lord D. Stuart) would do so, as much good might be effected by calling public attention to the matter. The hospitals in Constantinople for the use of the Turks were magnificent buildings, both for the military and for civilians of all ranks. He found the same to be the case at Adrianople. When he found these infidels acting in this noble way, he felt shame at the contrast which the hospitals of this great Christian country presented. He had felt it his duty to call the attention of the Committee to this subject, and he hoped his right hon. Friend the Chief Commissioner of Works would inform the Committee how much money was to be appropriated to the building of a new hospital at Constantinople, and would at the same time give them some assurance that regard would be paid to the interior arrangements and to the comfort of the sick.

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH said, that one object of the Vote was to remedy the defect of the present hospital at Constantinople, and another object of the Vote was to build new consular offices and a prison. The estimated cost of the new offices was 5,400*l.*; of the hospital, 3,400*l.*; of the prison, 2,600*l.*; and other contingencies, 1,911*l.* It was calculated that the time it would take to erect the hospital would be about two years. At the expiration of that time, he hoped they would have a hospital in Constantinople which would be fit for the reception of British sailors, with an efficient medical staff to minister to their wants.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he wished to know under whose superintendence the building would be placed, and whether the sailors would be charged anything for the medical services required by them?

MR. J. WILSON said, the Consul General was charged with the whole of the arrangements. He thought the noble Lord (Lord D. Stuart) was misinformed when he stated that the sailors were charged very highly at the hospital. The charge made to them was very low. The arraugement made for the support of the hospital in future was this—the English merchants had consented to pay a tonnage on all merchandise taken into port for the purpose of maintaining the hospital, so that he did not think any charge would henceforth be necessary to be made on the sailors.

LORD DUDLEY STUART said, the hon. Secretary of the Treasury had given a flat contradiction to his statement. He (Lord D. Stuart) had said that the sailors paid a very extravagant sum for hospital accommodation. The hon. Gentleman got up and said that they paid a very low sum. Now, he would repeat, when he was at Constantinople he was told that the men had to pay a great deal more for their accommodation at the hospital than their own wages amounted to—that they had to pay between five and six pounds a month, while they were only receiving three pounds a month wages. He begged to express a hope that the noble Lord the President of the Council would communicate upon this subject with the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, so that this monstrous evil might be immediately corrected.

SIR THOMAS ACLAND said, he thought a Vote of 3,400*l.* was a small sum for the erection of a hospital, and he should like to know what was the average number of sick persons to be provided for?

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH said, that accommodation would be afforded for forty patients, which was considered to be quite sufficient.

MR. LAYARD said, the Ambassador's palace at Constantinople had cost an enormous sum, but it was only proposed to lay out 3,400*l.* in the seamen's hospital. He could bear testimony to the description which had been given of the present hospital, and he begged to ask whether it was intended that the new hospital should be built of wood or stone, because, in Constantinople, that made a great difference? There was a large amount of fees paid to the Consul General in Constantinople, which, he believed, were destined for this establishment.

MR. J. WILSON said, no fees went to this establishment. The Consul General there was obliged to hold a court of justice, and the fees went to support it.

MR. LAYARD said, he did not see any reason for so large a sum as 5,400*l.* being appropriated to the erection of offices for the Consul, when it was known that he already possessed what might be termed a palace in Constantinople. He would again inquire whether the hospital would be built of stone or of wood?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that it was the intention of the Government that the hospital should be built of stone. In answer to his noble Friend (Lord D. Stuart), he begged to state that he would immediately communicate with his noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs on the subject of the hospital at Constantinople.

Vote agreed to.

METROPOLITAN SEWERS BILL.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

LORD SEYMOUR objected to proceeding with the Bill at that late hour. An outlay of 600,000*l.* was involved in the provisions of the Bill, and the House ought to be fully acquainted with all the particulars before proceeding further with it. Many details of the Bill also required further explanation.

SIR J. V. SHELLEY hoped the noble Lord would reconsider the 6th clause, which would materially interfere with the interests of the wharfingers along the banks of the Thames. That clause would be likely to cause a great outcry on the part of those interests.

SIR B. HALL said, another point of great importance was the cost of erecting embankments against the tidal waters. The whole expense of this would have to be borne by those occupying the frontage, while those behind would enjoy the advantage of having their property defended. They surely ought to be liable for some portion of the necessary expenditure.

SIR J. PAKINGTON moved the adjournment of the debate.

Amendment proposed, "That this Debate be now adjourned."

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that the clause referred to had been suggested to him by persons who believed that their operation would be beneficial. The principle of the Bill was, that the local authorities should make their own sewers, so far as they could, and reserve to the direction of the Commissioners the construction of the great trunk lines which were to carry off the general sewage of the whole metropolis; and it was in accordance with this principle that he had agreed to these clauses. Should the machinery prove in any respect imperfect, it could be amended. His anxiety had been to render this Commission as far as possible representative of the wants of the metropolis. He had, therefore, requested the Members for the different boroughs each to recommend a Commissioner, which had been done. The Commission, therefore, although nominated by the Crown, would represent the interests of the various districts. It would be for the Commissioners; and not for the Home Secretary, to determine the question of square or tubular drainage. The 600,000*l.* to which it was proposed to extend the power of the Commissioners to raise by loan, was necessary, to enable them to commence the construction of the two great out-fall drains, one for the north and the other for the south side of the river; works which the hon. Member for Lambeth well knew were of urgent necessity; and if the Bill were not agreed to, they would be delayed for another year. It was possible the machinery might not be quite perfect, but he would endeavour to make it so. If the House objected he would not press the going into Committee that night.

LORD SEYMOUR said, that, so far from the power of authorising the formation of separate sewer districts being left in the hands of the Commissioners, the Bill expressly placed the power with the Home Secretary.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he was going to make an alteration in the Bill to transfer this power.

Motion and Original Question withdrawn; Committee deferred till To-morrow.

RUSSIAN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES BILL.

House in Committee.

MR. J. WILSON moved that the Committee be further postponed till to-morrow.

LORD DUDLEY STUART said, the debate was formerly adjourned to allow of the presence of the law officers of the Crown. Both of them were now present, and he did not think it would be unfair to go on with the Bill, more especially as they had also present the leader of the Opposition to the measure in the person of the hon. Secretary to the Treasury.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he thought the difficulty in which they were now placed, was owing to the Government taking the unusual and inconvenient course of proceeding with Supply till past one o'clock in the morning. But for that they might have been able to dispose of this Bill; and, under these circumstances, it was right that the Bill should be disposed of one way or other. They had had the strongest possible language used on this Bill by the noble Lord the Home Secretary, and they had had equally strong language used by another Member of the Administration; and he therefore thought they had a right to know what the views of the Government were with respect to this Bill. But, instead of that, what had taken place? It was adjourned on Wednesday, merely that they might have the opinions of the law officers of the Crown. Well, the law officers were now present, the Members of the Government were present, the supporters and opponents of the Motion were present, and yet they were told they could not go on because the Votes of Supply had driven them over till two o'clock in the morning.

Mr. J. WILSON would remind the right hon. Gentleman that, had the salutary Motion to prevent Motions being made before going into Supply been properly carried into effect to-night, they would not have been so late.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that if it was the pleasure of the House to proceed with this Bill, it would be undoubtedly necessary to make some important alterations in it. If the Committee would agree that the Bill should be postponed till Tuesday or Wednesday, then, without pledging himself to an approbation of the principle of the Bill, he would take into consideration what the form of these Amendments should be.

Mr. I. BUTT said, this was no answer to the appeal which had been made, whether it was the intention of the Government to allow the discussion on this Bill to be renewed during the present Session, or whether it was to be thrown overboard by being fixed at an hour when it could not be proceeded with. This matter was of the more importance, because what the hon. and learned Gentleman had just stated was at variance with the assurances which had been given to the House by his noble Friend (Lord D. Stuart). The hon. and learned Solicitor General had been prudent enough not to pledge the Government upon this subject, as it would be difficult to do upon any subject on earth. But his noble Friend had on a former occasion assured the House that not only did the hon. and learned Gentleman approve of the principle of the Bill, but that he did so in the most marked manner, by suggesting an Amendment to be proposed on the third reading. The Bill was approved by the greater number of the House—"No, no!" Yes, it was supposed by an overwhelming majority, and even some of those who opposed it, like the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. T. Baring), did so on the ground that the Bill ought to have been undertaken by the Government. Here, then, was a Bill on which the Government was divided—a Bill on which the noble Lord the Home Secretary had contrived to fix the eyes of Europe; and yet they had no one to tell them what the intentions of the Government were. He did not know whom to address as the leader of the House. He would ask the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Wilson) who was the representative of the ascendant party in the Government? Was it the noble Lord opposite, or did the opinions of the noble Lord the Home Secretary prevail? He hoped one or other of them would give the Committee an assurance that this discussion would be resumed some other day.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, as the hon. and learned Member for Youghal had attacked him for having abstained from giving an opinion, he would now state that the Bill had been prepared with the most laudable disregard of everything that ought to have been attended to in its composition. He had desired delay in order that the defects in this notable measure might be rendered less glaring. Though the Bill was framed—as he told the noble Lord (Lord D. Stuart)—in accordance with the spirit of the law, yet it was framed with the most perfect neglect of all the interests of British merchants in all their dealings with neutral nations. And though, as the House had approved of the principle of the Bill, and as they were now in Committee, it was not necessary that he should express his opinion of its principle, and he was anxious, therefore, to confine his attention to its defects; yet he would now inform the hon. and learned Member that, in the first place, there was hardly anything that was written in the Bill which ought to remain, and next, that if there was anything which did remain, it ought to remain with a vast number of qualifications in order to prevent mischief and to render it as powerless and as little operative as possible. Now take the first words of the Bill—

"If any person or persons shall purchase or sell any shares or securities for a debt, or for any other purpose accept, or assign, or transfer, or offer as security for any debt or claim, and give over, assign, or transfer any part of these prohibited loans, he shall be guilty of misdemeanor."

So, supposing that at Amsterdam any merchant should be bankrupt, or should make any assignment of his property for the benefit of his creditors, amongst whom British merchants would be the principal creditors, should they, therefore, accept this assignment, although they might do so in perfect ignorance of the fact that amongst this property so assigned there was some portion of these prohibited articles, they as British merchants would be guilty of misdemeanor. If, again, any individual should be appointed a residuary legatee, he would be unable to take any portion which might consist of these stocks or loans. For a third case, suppose a Dutch merchant became bankrupt, and an English merchant who happened to be one of his creditors went over to Holland to claim his debt, he would be immediately told that he had no right to any portion, say 50,000*l.*, which might be invested in these loans, because, forsooth, the British Parliament had prohibited it. It appeared that all these contingencies were perfectly unknown to the framers of the Bill, for the Bill was drawn up without any provisions for the case of transactions similar to those which he had just mentioned, into which a British merchant might be drawn without any will of his own. So far, indeed, as the principle itself of the Bill was concerned, which prevented British subjects from dealing directly by their own voluntary acts in Russian loans, it was quite in conformity with the principle of the existing law; but if the measure were permitted to go on he had drawn up a form of words which would prevent the Bill from interfering in transactions in which its operation would be altogether absurd. He would read the terms of this proviso, which he considered necessary to be added to the Bill—

"Provided only that the provisions of the Act do not extend to or include any British subject claiming interest in the estate or effects of any deceased person; or the case of any British subject taking the estate or effects of a debtor in execution; or the case of a British subject claiming in any country to be interested under any bankruptcy, insolvency, sequestration, cessio bonorum, or transfer of property in trust for creditors; but that in such cases a British subject may take such shares, dividends, or debts, due or belonging to him, notwithstanding that the same may arise or proceed from the sale or proceeds of any such stock or security."

The Solicitor General

He would lay this proviso on the table, intending to move that it should be added to the Bill.

MR. I. BUTT said, he must complain that the hon. and learned Solicitor General had made a personal attack upon him, and said he was prepared to stand by the Bill. He denied the justice of the hon. and learned Gentleman's criticism. He admitted that the proviso was one which he had himself suggested, and which he would have brought up if the noble Lord the Home Secretary had not himself stated that the Solicitor General was prepared to submit a proviso upon the third reading.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that certainly what passed in the small hours of the morning did infinite credit to the intellectual and physical vigour of hon. Members. It appeared that they became more energetic, and their spirits and physical energies seemed to increase as the time of night wore away, but he thought, with all deference, that they had not been employing their time to the best purpose. The Bill was one on which considerable difference of opinion existed, but a large majority had affirmed its principle, and he had no doubt that an equally large majority was prepared to affirm it now. It was stated with a good deal of ground the other evening that there were questions of detail in the Bill which required further consideration, and his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General had proposed a proviso, which seemed calculated to meet most of the objections which had been raised. This proviso they could not take into consideration now, because they were discussing the question of reporting progress, and as this discussion seemed likely to go on, he was of opinion that they had better report progress now, and as Wednesday was an open day, the Bill might then be taken the first thing.

LORD DUDLEY STUART said, that he did not object to reporting progress, but he trusted the Committee would allow him to say a few words on account of what had fallen from the Solicitor General. The hon. and learned Gentleman had said that the opinion which he had given to him (Lord D. Stuart) with regard to the Bill was given without reading it. He (Lord D. Stuart) must, with all respect, directly contradict this statement. At the time he spoke to the hon. and learned Gentleman, he (Lord D. Stuart) had the Bill in his hand, and the hon. and learned Gentleman looked at it cursorily and expressed himself very much opposed to it. The following day he met the hon. and learned Gentleman, who was kind enough to say, "I have looked at your Bill, and examined it, and think it unobjectionable—except in some particulars." They were the same as the objections which the hon. and learned Gentleman had just stated, which he proposed to remove by a proviso, and the heads of this proviso he wrote down upon the Bill, which he (Lord D. Stuart) then held in his hand. The hon. and learned Gentleman then said that if this proviso were added, he had no objection to the Bill. To this he (Lord D. Stuart) replied that he was willing to accept the proviso, and would draw up a clause to the same effect, and have it added to the Bill. The only reason why no such proviso was prepared and put upon the notices of Motion was, that the hon. and learned Gentleman had himself proposed to draw it up. It did appear to be hardly fair, after this, that the hon. and learned Gentleman should now say that there was hardly a single word in the Bill which ought to remain in it. He thought it would have been more in accordance with courtesy and with consistency, considering the kind communications that he had made to him on the subject, if he had allowed him to see the proviso after he had drawn it up.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, this would be a lesson to him not to have any communication on Bills with respect to which he had no official duty to perform. He had communicated to the noble Lord, in answer to the question which he had put to him, having first misapprehended his Bill from his own statement of it, and having understood that it was intended to apply to Russian stock generally. He was afterwards told that it applied to Russian stock created since the declaration of war; and he then stated that it was in conformity with the general spirit of the law. The Committee would bear him out in saying that he was unwilling to express any opinion on the merits of the Bill, or to take any part in the discussion, except to do what he had told the noble Lord he was willing to do, to frame a proviso, which would make it more like what it ought to be, and as little objectionable as possible in case the principle were to be approved of.

SALE OF BEER, &c., BILL.

Bill read 3^d (according to order).

THE EARL OF HARROWBY explained the Amendments of which he had given notice. The first Amendment would enable public-houses to be open on Sunday from one o'clock to half-past 2 P.M., thus giving an extension of half an hour beyond the time fixed originally in the Bill. The next Amendment would allow them to open again at 5 o'clock P.M., and remain open till 10 P.M. in the winter and till 11 P.M. in the summer, but requiring that no liquor should be served after 10 P.M. The object of the latter alteration was to meet the case of those persons who sought recreation in the neighbourhood of London on Sunday, and required refreshment. Whilst locomotion on Sunday was allowed, it must of necessity be accompanied by some provision which would secure to persons travelling the means of obtaining refreshment. Refreshment was an incident to locomotion, and he did not see how the two were to be separated. He hoped that with these Amendments the closing of these places of public entertainment would be secured in the summer at 11 o'clock P.M. at the latest, and at 10 P.M. in the winter, which he thought would be a material improvement, and one that would considerably promote public order and decency on the Lord's Day.

LORD REDESDALE said, he considered that while 300,000 persons went out every Sunday upon pleasure excursions, it would be difficult to interfere with the means of providing them with refreshments. Their object should be to combine as far as possible consideration for the necessary requirements of these people with regard for public order. There was, however, this difficulty in dealing with this matter—that while in the large towns from which the excursionists proceeded in the morning, and to which they returned probably late at night, the hour of 10 or 11 o'clock P.M. might not be too late to allow refreshments to be supplied to them, it might be altogether too late in the country.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY moved his first Amendment, that 5 o'clock P.M. be substituted for 8 P.M. as the hour at which public-houses might open in the afternoon.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, that he would make no objection to the first Amendment of his noble Friend, for allowing public-houses to be open from one to half-past two on Sundays; but to the second Amendment he could not agree. The Bill as it originally stood proposed to limit the sale of beer on Sunday evenings to the hours between six and nine o'clock, but to meet all reasonable demands the time had been extended to ten o'clock, and with that provision the Bill received the sanction of the other House, and came up to their Lordships. Now, however, his noble Friend proposed to extend the hours to from five to eleven o'clock, instead of from six to ten—making a difference of three hours as compared with the first Bill, and allowing these places to be open for six consecutive hours. Thus the positive gain to the better observance of the Lord's Day, after all the exertions that had been made, and the strong and general feeling that had been expressed on the subject, would, if this latter alteration were adopted, only amount to two hours and a half, namely, the closing of public-houses from half-past 2 to 5 o'clock P.M. The demand of the country was not merely for a modified restriction, but for the closing of these places during the whole of Sunday, the immense body of the evidence taken before the Select Committee of the other House from witnesses belonging to all classes most emphatically supporting that more stringent regulation. Therefore, the mere closing of public-houses for two hours and a half more than was the case at present would be a very inadequate and most unsatisfactory adjustment of this matter. When the people were most anxious to see this great social reform introduced for the benefit of themselves and families, he thought their Lordships should render every assistance to the carrying out of an improvement so ardently desired; and nothing could give him more pain than to see Amendments proposed in their Lordships' House which would defeat the Bill that had been sent up from the House of Commons; because it might be said that their Lordships had not so much sympathy for the improvement of the social condition of the people or so much consideration for their wishes, or so much knowledge of what concerned their welfare, as the Committee of the other House, who had taken evidence on this subject, and sent up this Bill. He would therefore certainly take the sense of the House against the second of his noble Friend's Amendments, and endeavour to have the Bill adopted as it came up from the House of Commons.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON would support the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) in his opposition to the second of these Amendments. The alterations now proposed would go very nearly to destroy the whole value of the measure. He had been the humble instrument in inducing their Lordships to agree to the existing law, which closed public-houses in London till one o'clock on Sundays, and the most beneficial effects had resulted from that regulation. Subsequently when a Police Bill for Liverpool was proposed, their Lordships consented, at his suggestion, to insert a clause closing public-houses in Liverpool also till one o'clock on the Lord's Day; and influential individuals in that town, who had remonstrated against the provision when it was first proposed, had since frankly confessed to him that their opinion had since then been entirely changed by actual experience of its salutary and beneficial operation. The four hours from six to ten o'clock at night was surely a long enough time for any one to spend in drinking at a public-house on the Lord's Day, and to restrict them to that time would be doing no injury to the working classes, but a real benefit to them, and especially a benefit to their wives and families. He had no wish to prevent the people from enjoying proper recreation, and he admitted that they could not compel them to be religious by law; but Parliament had in its power to remove from them strong temptations to violate the precepts of morality and religion. Protracted habits of intemperance tended not only to the ruin of their own souls, but to the impoverishment of their wives and families; and he therefore hoped their Lordships would not consent to relax the fair and moderate restrictions contained in this Bill, in the shape in which it came up from another place.

THE MARQUESS OF OLANRICARDE

said, that it would be a great hardship to artisans and others who were obliged to live all the week in crowded neighbourhoods, and who wished to pass the Sunday, or part of it at least, in the country—at Windsor, Hampton Court, or some similar place—to be debarred from obtaining the comfort and refreshment which were needful for them. The real question contained in this Bill turned on the want of a proper definition of the word “traveller;” and though he had no objection to see public-houses closed in the large towns, yet he believed that great discomfort and hardship would be occasioned to excursionists and others for the want of a proper understanding as to who were and who were not to be considered “travellers.”

On Question that the words fixing the hours from 1 P.M. to 2 P.M. be omitted for the purpose of inserting words extending the period to 2½ P.M.; Amendment agreed to.

On Question that the words fixing the hours from 6 P.M. to 10 P.M. stand part of the clause.

MEDICAL GRADUATES (UNIVERSITY OF LONDON) BILL.

LORD MONTEAGLE moved, That the Committee (which stood appointed for this Day) be put off to Tuesday next.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL wished to state, that since the discussion on this Bill the other night, he had seen deputations from the various Universities, and also from the various licensing bodies connected with the medical profession, but he did not find that any of these gentlemen were in favour of this Bill; they all objected, without exception, to it, either upon one ground or another. They thought that the London University had not a better claim to the privileges proposed to be conferred upon it by this Bill than the other Universities in different parts of the kingdom. He (the Duke of Argyll) had no objection to granting to the graduates of the University of London degrees entitling them to practise medicine; but he contended that if they adopted this principle they ought to go further, and give them the right also to practise surgery, pharmacy, and all the other branches of medicine. He understood that there was a doubt whether the word “physic” would not include surgery and pharmacy as well as pure physic, and whether, by this means, the Bill would not have a larger operation than was intended. He meant no disrespect in any way to the London University by the disapproval he felt bound to express as to the present measure, and he would take that opportunity of expressing the sincere gratification he experienced on a late occasion, when present at the distribution of the prizes at the London University, at seeing some of the young men carry away the highest prizes in the most exalted department of medical science. There was nothing in the present Bill which was in any way calculated to effectually carry out the great principles of medical reform, and the difference of qualifications that were required by the several Universities would throw almost insuperable difficulties in the way of carrying the present measure into effect. Again, he could not understand, if we admitted the graduates of London and Durham Universities to the benefit of this Bill, upon what principle it was the graduates of the Dublin and Scotch Universities were to be excluded. He did not think there was anything in the argument that this Bill was only the fulfilment of the pledge given to the founders of the London University; and, in Committee, he should certainly move the insertion of a clause to provide that the Universities of Scotland and Ireland should possess the same powers as it was proposed to confer on the London University by this Bill. The great objection, however, that he had to the Bill was, that it prejudged the great question of medical reform, and did so in order to favour the University of London, to the exclusion and injury of other and the older Universities.

LORD MONTEAGLE said, that the only operation of this Bill would be to give the graduates of the University of London not a general right to practise, but only the same privileges which were possessed by the graduates of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. The Bill was the fulfilment of a pledge, made at the time of the foundation of the University of London by the Government of the day, that the new University should be treated with the same favour as the others. It had been supported in its passage through the other House by the noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Home Department, and every Member of the Government who was present; he could not, therefore, understand the noble Duke's opposition to it. He should not be so earnest in support of the Bill if he were not convinced that it would not in any way interfere with the great principles of medical reform, and if he did not believe that it would be instrumental in effecting a great improvement, without doing injury to any one.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he had forgot to mention, that only yesterday he had had an interview with the President and Fellows of the College of Physicians, who strongly objected to the Bill, on the ground that it included much more than appeared upon the face of it.

LORD WYNFORD feared that the partial attempt at legislation contemplated by this Bill would merely prejudice the larger and more necessary measures of medical reform.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, that although the discussion then going on was not one intended to lead to a division, but more in the nature of a conversation than anything else, yet he was induced to take part in it, because he was enabled to confirm the statements both of the noble Lord on the cross-benches (Lord Monteagle) and his noble Friend near him. As to what the noble Lord had said about the London University, there was no doubt that the expectation had always been held out to it of receiving the advantages which this Bill professed to give; and, as far as medicine was concerned, sharing the same amount of favour as the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. The University of London, having now undeniably proved itself entitled to the approval of the public by the very excellent way in which it had educated the men who resorted to it in the highest branches of medical science, and having, in fact, turned out better scholars in this respect than either the Universities of Oxford or Cambridge, claimed the privileges we had promised to extend to her, and which we could not now, with any grace or justice, refuse to give. He should, while paying a just tribute to the London University, be sorry to throw any disparagement upon other medical and educational bodies; but in these matters praise should be given when fairly earned. As to what the noble Duke had said about the fear which existed lest the words of this Bill might give a more extended power than was contemplated, there was no doubt such a fear did exist, but it could easily be removed by some clause being

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clauses 1 to 3 agreed to.

Clause 4 (Expense of Storehouse, how to be provided for).

MR. ROBERT PALMER said, he wished to insert at the beginning of the clause the words "one half of," which would have the effect of transferring half the expense of the new establishments from the county rates to the Consolidated Fund. The question was one of very great importance, and, as he saw the noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Home Department in his place, he would beg to ask him whether, after the discussion which had taken place on the subject, he would not give his consent to this Amendment. Memorials had been agreed to at quarter sessions, in which the memorialists stated that they had always considered that the charges in question ought not to be defrayed out of the county rates, but, inasmuch as the militia was a national force for the general protection of Her Majesty's subjects, they were of opinion that it should be borne by the nation at large. He admitted that for many years the counties had been called on to provide for the expense occasioned by the militia force, but he thought, when that expense was so much extended by the introduction of a new system, they ought not to be compelled by Act of Parliament to bear the burden of the new charge. It was unnecessary for him to raise any of the points in detail which already had occupied the attention of the House, but he hoped the noble Lord would give a satisfactory answer, and support a Motion for a national expenditure for the buildings required for the militia, which force, in consequence of the war, had become of national importance—being moved about to different parts of the country to garrison those places which had previously been occupied by the regular troops; and he therefore considered it unfair to tax particular localities for these necessary establishments. At the same time, looking to the fact that the charge for militia storehouses, &c., had been hitherto defrayed by the counties, he did not think it wise to ask for more than was proposed by this Amendment.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he thought the proposal of his hon. Friend was founded on misapprehension with respect to the principle upon which the law now imposed on counties the expense necessary for this purpose, and he altogether denied that there had been any change in that principle whatever. [MR. PALMER: The extent of its application. I did not say principle.] Well, then, with respect to the extent of its application, the Committee must be aware that when improvements took place in any departments of the State they were frequently attended by increased expense; that had been the case with many charges on the Consolidated Fund, and if improvements had been made in the militia establishment which led to increased expense, it was no reason whatever for throwing the burden on the Consolidated Fund. It was a constitutional principle that they should impose local burdens for the support of an establishment which was locally valuable. Another view of the case had been taken, and it was contended that they had no right to make any additional charge on counties unless the counties received something in exchange. But in this case he thought counties had greatly gained by recent changes. Previously to the passing of the Act of 1852, the expense on counties for militia barracks was enormous, and by another change in the law the 6*l*. bounty on volunteers was defrayed out of the Consolidated Fund instead of out of the poor rates, which charge was of a still more local character. Then, again, if sufficient men could not be produced by ballot, there was an annual charge of 10*l*. per man paid out of the county rates, but in consequence of the success of the volunteer principle the necessity for the ballot had altogether ceased, and, indeed, was, practically speaking, abolished. During the last war, the cost of substitutes ranged from 28*l*. to 30*l*., and there had been paid on that account, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, during that period, the large sum of 75,000*l*. by means of a tax to which every man was liable, and which fell with very different degrees of severity on men with various incomes. From the circumstance, therefore, of the ballot falling into desuetude, the bounty for volunteers being paid out of the Consolidated Fund, and other causes, it was impossible to calculate how large a saving had been effected to counties; he therefore thought that all those circumstances ought to be taken into consideration. Then, again, in many counties storehouses were completed, and in others they were in progress; if this principle were adopted, there would be the greatest difficulty in computing the exact charges to be defrayed out of the county rates. It would be very unjust to those counties which had built their storehouses—perhaps, in some cases, with borrowed money—if they were to be left to get rid of their debt as they could, while Government relieved those counties which had been unwilling or laggard in the matter from half the necessary expense. Great facilities had been given to counties for raising money for the purpose of extending the storehouses: and as this was a constitutional and local force, was it right to transfer the charge of the establishments to a great degree on the Consolidated Fund at the moment they had introduced a system of relief for counties? He thought not; and hoped the House of Commons would continue the existing system, which had stood the test of many years, and by means of which the expense of the storehouses in question had been defrayed out of the county rates. For these reasons, therefore, he opposed the Amendment.

MR. HENLEY said, he suspected that the ballot had not been adopted, not with the object of relieving persons interested in land, but because he believed the Government considered that one volunteer was worth a dozen pressed men. The counties were still liable to the ballot if men did not volunteer; and if that was resorted to and failed to raise the requisite force, the counties would still be liable to pay the fine imposed upon them by law if they failed to levy the appointed force. It could not, therefore, be said that they had been relieved from this charge. It was said that there was nothing new in the principle of imposing this charge upon the counties; and there was no doubt that the principle of "paying" was old enough; but the right hon.

Gentleman certainly proposed to extend its application to the counties very materially by this Bill. This charge was unquestionably originally imposed on the land; but it should not be forgotten that the relative value of landed and other property had very much changed since that time. Many charges had been removed from the land on this ground; and he thought they ought to follow these precedents with regard to the charge now in question. The militia was a national force, and its expense ought, therefore, to be borne by the country at large.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he considered that the arguments of his right hon. Friend (Mr. S. Herbert) were perfectly conclusive, and that they had not been shaken by the observations of the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley). The only reason that had been urged for the transfer of these charges from the public revenue to local taxation was, that some material change had been made which justified such a transfer, for, if things now remained in all respects as they were when the Militia Acts were originally passed, there could be no ground or pretence for requiring any alteration. Now, what was the change that had actually taken place? It was said, that during the last two years, more extensive accommodation had been demanded with regard to storehouses than had previously been required. He admitted this, but the demand had not involved any great increase of expense. If, however, the law had required that somewhat more extensive accommodation than previously existed should be provided, on the other hand the law had allowed the distribution of the charge for this accommodation over a long period of time, so that he believed in many cases the addition to the county rates would not exceed a halfpenny in the pound for the period during which the charge would apply. Now, he thought such an addition to the rate would be hardly perceptible. [Mr. HENLEY said, that it would form one-sixth part of the whole county rate.] Well, if that were so, he (Viscount Palmerston) did not think there was much cause to complain of the weight of the tax. It must be remembered, however, that the inhabitants of counties had been relieved, not only from the pecuniary burdens incidental to the ballot, but from the great personal inconvenience which they suffered from the ballot; for the arrangements connected with the ballot were not only attended with expense, but with a great deal of personal trouble, which, in the case of the persons who were subjected to it, was equal to pecuniary loss. It was true that the ballot still remained part of the law, and he thought the abrogation of the ballot would be inexpedient, but he certainly could not conceive a case likely to happen in which it would be necessary to have recourse to the ballot. Voluntary service was, unquestionably, infinitely preferable to compulsory service, and the great increase of population, together with the admirable spirit which had been displayed by the people throughout the country with regard to the militia force, certainly justified the Government in considering that there could not be any necessity for having recourse to the ballot. It was said that the militia was a national force, but it was no more a national force now than it had been from its first institution. It had always been a force levied in each county locally, confined to such county for training and exercise during time of peace, but liable in time of war to be permanently embodied and marched anywhere for the general defence of the country. There were, however, circumstances connected with the militia which did very much localise the force and influence its general character. The officers of the militia were not appointed by the Crown, as was the case with respect to officers of the Army and Navy, but were selected by the lords lieutenant of counties, and consisted chiefly of gentlemen connected with the various counties. Therefore, when the militia was called a national force, it must not be forgotten that it had, in its very root, a clear connection with the counties to which the respective regiments belonged. Then he would ask the Committee to consider whether the county charges now remained in the same condition in which they were at the time when the 42 Geo. III. was passed? Had not the counties been relieved from many very important charges since that period, such as expenses connected with gaols, with criminal prosecutions, with the maintenance of convicted prisoners, and with the salaries of schoolmasters and surgeons of poorhouses? A great number of charges of this nature had been taken off the counties, and transferred to the general revenue since the period when counties were first required to provide storehouses. When, therefore, because some trifling addition to the storehouses was proposed, with regard to the provision of rooms for half-a-dozen sergeants and guard-rooms—which were, in fact, only what the law always virtually required—in order that the buildings might be sufficient and safe for the custody of arms, clothing, and stores—hon. Gentlemen proposed that this charge should at once be transferred from the county rate to the general revenue; they seemed to him entirely to forget the great relief which had of late years been afforded to counties by the removal of charges which when the law was first adopted were borne by the county rate. He, therefore, considered, viewing the subject as a whole, and looking to the fair balance between the counties and the public, that there was no sufficient and adequate ground for the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Berkshire.

SIR THOMAS ACLAND said, he should support the Amendment, upon the ground that it went to carry out the system first introduced by Sir Robert Peel, of charging one half the county expenditure upon the Consolidated Fund.

MR. YORKE said, he also would support the Amendment. The object they had in view in raising the militia was the defence of the nation, to which, indeed, all the stores belonged.

MR. J. WILSON said, it was important that the charge should be levied in such a manner as would be most economical, as, whether it was paid by the county rate or the Consolidated Fund, the charge would fall in a great measure on the counties. He could point to a return, showing that the consequence of transferring the charge of prosecutions from the county rate to the Consolidated Fund had been, that the charge had been doubled, and the same result might follow with regard to the militia if this Amendment were adopted. There might have been some reason for this Amendment before, when the counties alone were rated, but by this Bill corporate towns would also be rated, so that the whole fixed property of the country would be chargeable. There was a great outcry against centralisation, but he put it to the Committee, whether the adopting this Amendment was not a step towards centralisation.

MR. ORAUFURD said, he would refer the Committee to a speech of the noble Lord the Home Secretary, in which he said that what they wanted was a regular militia, and what they did not want was a local militia.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, a local militia was so called in contradistinction to a general militia, but the whole force was essentially local. If this Amendment were adopted, it would be for Government to consider whether they would go on with the Bill or not.

MR. BARROW said, the militia had ceased to be a local force, and in proof of this, the Committee must be aware that the Essex militia was stationed in London at that moment.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, perhaps hon. Gentlemen were not aware that there were great interests in this country besides the interests of the country gentlemen. He was one of those who had been sent into that House to support the general interest. When that House departed from a correct principle, the departure was always used as a reason for taking another step in the same direction.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 85; Noes 60: Majority 25.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply to Mr. Henley, said, that the principle which had just been affirmed by the vote of the Committee was a very important one, and the Government would consider what course they would take on the subject hereafter.

COLONEL BLAIR said, that in many counties there were barracks now existing which had long been unoccupied, and he wished to know whether such buildings might not be used as storehouses under this Bill?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he was not aware that there were any useless barracks in the country; but, if that were the case, and such barracks were handed over to the counties, of course the counties must pay for them.

Clause agreed to, as were also Clauses 5 to 26 inclusive.

Clause 27.

COLONEL NORTH moved the insertion of the following words—

"Officers of the regular Army or East India Company's service, or who have served five years in the regular Army, Marines, or East India Company's service, shall be admitted into the militia force without any qualifications being required."

MR. HENLEY said, that one main reason of the success which had attended the raising of the militia was the fact, that so many of the officers were connected with the counties to which the several regiments belonged, and he hoped the Committee would pause, before it agreed to the Amendment.

VISCOUNT JOCELYN said, he did not object to having one or two military officers in a militia regiment, but, generally speaking, he thought the country gentlemen, after a little time, were not surpassed by any officer of the regulars; and most colonels commanding militia regiments would agree with him that it was desirable, as long as possible, to get the country gentlemen to officer that force.

COLONEL NORTH said, the appointment of those officers rested with the lords lieutenant of counties, and he feared that, in many instances, they might be disposed to give notice to quit, in case the regiments were ordered to be permanently embodied.

COLONEL SIBTHORP said, he considered it most desirable that the officers should be gentlemen connected with the county, wherever that object could be attained.

SIR JOHN TYRELL said, he thought the Committee should make up its mind as to the hands in which they would invest the power of selecting officers, because he knew that in some cases considerable difficulty had been experienced when gentlemen were anxious to join the militia. It was the opinion of the late Duke of Wellington, that this power should be placed in the colonels of militia, and not in the lords lieutenant of counties. It was all very well to talk of giving the militia a territorial position, but when he remembered what was the position which country gentlemen occupied in that House, if the noble Lord the President of the Council proposed to inflict the knout upon the agricultural interest generally, he should not be at all surprised. He was anxious, therefore, that the authority should be well defined.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, there were two objects to be kept in view: first, to maintain and encourage the connection of the regiment with the county; and next, to maintain that infusion of military feeling which arose from having a proportion, at least, of officers who had been in the regular Army or Marines. The choice of officers rested, as he thought, very properly, with the lords lieutenant of counties; and he did not think it likely that a lord lieutenant, acting, as of course he would do, in communication with the colonel of the regiment, would be disposed to set aside any young men of the county who were willing to serve and take commissions in a militia regiment. His first choice of candidates would certainly be from among the youth and gentry of the county. Still he knew, from looking at the returns, that there had been some difficulty in filling up the post of captain from particular circumstances, and also great inconvenience in getting subalterns, for, the pay being chiefly for the training period, young men of a certain condition did not like to incur the expense of equipments. He thought the clause of the hon. and gallant Colonel, if given effect to, would assist in getting for subalterns qualified persons, who might expect, if a vacancy occurred, and there were no very eligible candidate among gentlemen of the county, that they would get promoted to the captaincy. In many regiments there were one or two captains who had served in the line, and a very small infusion of military habits and experience ripened the rest of the regiment in a very rapid and extraordinary way. He would, therefore, agree to the Amendment.

MR. EVELYN said, he had great respect for lords lieutenant of counties; but the Committee should remember who they were, and that they received their appointments generally upon political considerations alone. The colonel, as the man who was responsible for the discipline and efficiency of the regiment, ought, he considered, to be vested with the power of selecting the officers; and the system now in operation of vesting that power in lords lieutenant of counties was an anomaly.

LORD HOTHAM said, he had lately observed in the Gazette the appointment of an individual, whose name he did not remember, as an "honorary colonel." Now, as that appointment was, he believed, a novel one, he begged to ask the noble Lord what circumstances had led to its creation, what duties attached to the office, and what authority it conferred?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, when he first took this matter in hand, he was struck with the fact that considerable inconvenience frequently arose from the circumstance that regiments of the line were practically commanded by lieutenant colonels in quarters and in the field, whilst militia regiments were under the command of full colonels. The result was, that when a militia regiment came into the quarters of a regiment of the line, the militia colonel took the command over the lieutenant colonel of the line; and with all deference to militia colonels in general, one would not suppose that they were, either from habits or experience, altogether the best people to take the command of the troops in a garrison town. On the other hand, he felt it to be of great importance to maintain the link between the regiments of militia and the landed gentry of the county, and that great advantage generally arose from having in command of a regiment of militia some landed proprietor, who, by his personal influence and connections, might assist in raising men for the regiment, and so connect it with the gentry and inhabitants of the county. It was, therefore, determined that, with regard to all future appointments, the regiments of militia should be commanded in the same manner as a regiment of local militia during the war, by a lieutenant colonel commandant, and not by a full colonel. And he had issued a circular to the lords lieutenant of counties to the effect, that if any existing colonel placed himself in regard to his regiment on the same footing on which a general officer of the Army stood in regard to the regiment of which he was the colonel, he should be at liberty to do so; that was to say, he should retain his rank and position as colonel, but no longer interfere with the internal arrangements of the regiment in quarters or in the field, whilst he would be the channel of communication between the lord lieutenant and the regiment in regard to appointments and all other questions, with the exception of those relating to military discipline in quarters and in the field. He also stated in the circular, that with regard to future appointments, if in any particular case the lord lieutenant thought the appointment of such an officer to a regiment when a vacancy occurred would be conducive to the good of the service, no objection would be raised to that appointment being made. This, then, was the position of the honorary colonel to whom the noble Lord referred. He was an officer who held the rank of colonel of a regiment, wore the uniform of a colonel, and stood in the same relation to his regiment that a general officer did to a regiment of the line of which he was the colonel.

LORD HOTHAM said, that while thanking the noble Viscount for his explanation, he thought that the efficiency of a militia regiment depended very much on the time it was kept together, and during the last war there were regiments of that description in a far higher state of discipline than regiments of the line in this country. He ventured to doubt whether, under the new arrangement, the system would work well, nor did he think country gentlemen would be willing to accept the office of honorary colonel to which no military duties attached. There was another point to which he begged to call the attention of the noble Lord. He wished to ask whether, when two militia regiments came together, one commanded by a country gentleman and the other by an officer who had served in the line, the officers would take precedence according to the date of their commissions in the militia regiment, or whether the officer who had served in the line would be at liberty to date his commission from that time?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he must disclaim the slightest intention of casting any reflection upon the militia regiments of the country, which were in the highest state of efficiency, as proved by the fact that the inspecting officers on some occasions had actually taken some of the militia officers to be old soldiers. With regard to the question of the noble Lord, he thought it better that militia officers should rank together in accordance with their commissions in the same service rather than that any difficulty should arise in relation to a commission they might have held in either service before.

Amendment agreed to; Clause, as amended, added to the Bill.

Clause 28 agreed to.

Clause 29 (Non-commissioned officers and drummers offending in certain cases, in which the commanding officer does not think it necessary to bring the offenders before courts-martial, may be imprisoned for any period not exceeding seven days).

COLONEL NORTH said, he considered that the clause would produce a prejudicial effect upon the discipline of regiments by diminishing the influence of the non-commissioned officers. How was it possible that young soldiers especially, who had been subjected to punishment for breaches of military discipline, could entertain proper respect for non-commissioned officers who emerged from prison side by side with themselves? According to this clause, a serjeant major, who ranked next to a commissioned officer, might be put in solitary confinement or imprisoned with hard labour. He begged to move that the words "non-commissioned officer" be omitted from the clause.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that under the Mutiny Act, although commanding officers might sentence to confinement for 168 hours private soldiers who had been guilty of certain breaches of military discipline, no such power existed with regard to non-commissioned officers; and as the dismissal from a militia regiment of non-commissioned officers who had previously served in the regular forces was really no punishment at all, inasmuch as they were almost sure to obtain service in some other militia regiment, this clause had been proposed with a view of meeting that difficulty. He was willing, however, to consent that the clause should not apply to non-commissioned officers, and to adopt the Amendment placed on the paper by the noble Member for North Northumberland (Lord Lovaine), which was in the following terms—

"And if any person who shall have served in Her Majesty's forces, and shall afterwards have been enrolled as a non-commissioned officer on the permanent staff of the militia, shall be discharged from any regiment or corps for misconduct, the cause of his discharge shall be certified by the colonel or commandant of such regiment or corps on the back of the certificate of his discharge from Her Majesty's Army, and a copy of the same forwarded to the Adjutant General of Her Majesty's forces, the Secretary of State for the Home Department, and the Secretary at War."

COLONEL BLAIR said, the clause, in its present shape, had created a strong feeling of dissatisfaction among the non-commissioned officers in militia regiments, many of whom had served in the regular Army.

Clause, as amended, agreed to; remaining clauses agreed to.

House resumed.

CAPTAIN HYDE PARKER—QUESTION.

COLONEL BLAIR said, he wished to call the attention of the right hon. Baronet the First Lord of the Admiralty to a statement which had appeared in one of the public prints, and which, in his opinion, had cast an unmerited slur on the memory of a most gallant officer, who had recently fallen in the execution of his duty. He alluded to an article which appeared yesterday in a public journal in allusion to Captain Hyde Parker. There it was stated that "Captain Parker literally threw his life away, without glory to himself or result to the public service." He would not read the whole of the article, but it went on to state

—"Nothing would serve but the organisation of a little excursion for the sake of pleasure or curiosity." Now, the fact was, and he could so state from his own personal knowledge and from letters he had received, that the whole statement of that journal was totally void of foundation. He had the fullest reason to believe that this gallant officer, instead of having fallen in the indulgence of "pleasure or curiosity," had fallen in the zealous execution of his duty to his Queen and country; and he should be glad if the right hon. Gentleman opposite would inform the House whether or not despatches had been received which entirely bore him out in this correction of a statement which, having by this time gone, not merely throughout the country, but well nigh throughout Europe, required, if erroneous, to be corrected.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM: Sir, I am extremely obliged to the hon. and gallant Officer for having put to me this question, which enables me to give an answer which I hope will be satisfactory to him and to the House. The comments to which the hon. and gallant Officer has referred have, I know, inflicted the deepest pain on the surviving relatives of Captain Parker. I need not inform the House that his gallant father, Sir Hyde Parker, only died within the last few weeks, and his widow is in the last extremity of suffering, so severe, indeed, that the friends and relatives in attendance upon her have not ventured to inform her of the death of her son. The House may well imagine what pain such comments would cause to this lady so circumstanced. Those comments, I must say, have been somewhat hastily made under an entire misapprehension of the facts. The Board of Admiralty has taken the earliest opportunity of giving the utmost publicity to a despatch of Admiral Dundas, in which the real facts of the circumstances under which Captain Parker had fallen are officially related, and this despatch will appear in the Gazette of this evening. So far from being rash and unauthorised, Admiral Dundas speaks of Captain Parker as having acted in the most gallant manner in the destruction of the batteries outside of the Sulina mouth of the Danube. There were also batteries inside of the passage which Captain Parker thought it was his duty to destroy if possible; and in his boat with an armed party, and attended by another boat, he entered within the passage for the purpose of reconnoitring, when he received a fire of musketry from the battery. Without hesitation he instantly resolved to carry the battery by storm. He landed in the most gallant manner, and was shot through the heart in the execution of his duty. With respect to enterprises of this nature, I must say the public are somewhat hard task-masters. If bold and desperate enterprises are not undertaken, then there is some suspicion that orders have not been given to carry on the war with energy, and even the conduct of those who are employed is somewhat suspected. If, on the other hand, deeds of extraordinary boldness are performed, such as raised Lord Dundonald and other men to great celebrity, then the charge is of an opposite nature. It is imputed to them that they ran needless risk; that gallantry partakes of the character of foolhardiness, and that men who lose their lives in this way have almost received their just reward. I sincerely regret that in this case those observations have been made. Captain Parker was one of the most promising officers in the English Navy. He was the gallant son of a gallant father. On this occasion he acted as became his name, and he fell in the discharge of his duty, a bright example to other officers. I only regret that in the British Navy there is no other Hyde Parker now left; and I hope this House and the country will, at all events, be just to the memory of this gallant man. Let no adverse comments induce this House to believe that this gallant officer did not act in a manner which became him in the discharge of his duty, and that his memory is not entitled to the respect and veneration of his countrymen.

LEASES OF CROWN PROPERTY—MONTAGU HOUSE—EXPLANATION.

MR. DISRAELI said, he was anxious to correct an error which he made last evening in Committee of Supply, in respect of the renewal of Crown leases. In speaking on the Motion of the Government for the purchase of Burlington House, he impugned their conduct because they had renewed the lease of a house in the vicinity of the public offices, which he thought was detrimental to the public service. Now, it turned out that Her Majesty's Government were exempt from all blame in that respect, and that if any blame was attached to the renewal of the lease, strange to say, the blame was upon him, and that he was responsible. He hoped the House would allow him to explain the reason how he fell into so strange a mistake. In the summer of 1852 the question of the renewal of the Crown estates came to a considerable extent under his notice, and his attention was brought especially to the renewal of the leases of premises which were in London, and also in the vicinity of the public offices. He endeavoured to lay down certain principles which he thought ought to guide them in the renewal of leases of that sort of property, but with regard to the leases of houses in the vicinity of public offices he did not think they ought to be renewed. A minute was drawn up embodying his views, and it so happened that the question of the lease of Montagu House was brought before him in the middle of the summer, and it was refused, and last night, speaking from recollection, he really did believe, so far as he was concerned, that the renewal of the lease of that house had not taken place at the time, and he concluded that Her Majesty's present Ministers were responsible for that act. But it so happened, very shortly before the termination of the Government of Lord Derby, that the question of the renewal of that particular lease was again submitted to the consideration of the Treasury, and it was thought that there were certain equitable elements which he had not taken into consideration, which rendered it just that the lease should be renewed. At that time the new Parliament had just met, there was a very strong strain on his energies, and he was unable to give that attention which he ought to have done to that particular subject. His colleagues he was sure gave the subject the consideration it deserved; they arrived at a different conclusion from that he had arrived at, and he had not the slightest doubt that their decision was a just one. However, it received his sanction, and for that decision he alone was responsible. He need not say how much he regretted that he should have brought the charge against the Government for having done an act for which he himself was responsible. Perhaps the House would allow him to say, that notwithstanding the circumstance to which he had adverted, he was still of opinion that leases of houses in the vicinity of public offices should not be renewed, and that it was highly expedient that the House should support Government in obtaining the possession of any plots of ground near the public offices which they had an opportunity of obtaining.

BRIBERY, &c., BILL.

Order for Third Reading read.

LORD HOTHAM said, that in expressing his disapproval of this Bill, he hoped the House would not suppose that he approved of the practices which the Bill was intended to prevent. It would be just as reasonable to suppose that the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. Ewart) wished to encourage murder because he disapproved of capital punishments. During the passage of this Bill through Committee, it was asked on two or three occasions by the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) what the people would say if hon. Members did not sanction this or that clause. And it was more emphatically stated on another occasion by the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright), that if any obstacle were offered to the Bill in that House the people would be convinced that there was some foundation for the prevailing opinion, that there were important advantages to be gained by becoming a Member of that House—advantages which they, as Members, were unwilling to part with. Now his (Lord Hotham's) belief was, that there was nothing in this Bill at all calculated to dispel that belief; but, on the contrary, he thought that much had passed in the course of the discussion upon this measure which was rather calculated to strengthen and confirm such an impression. There were other matters about which the public wanted a more satisfactory answer than was contained in any provisions involved in this Bill. He had frequently heard it said, "You Gentlemen of the House of Commons profess great anxiety for political purity, freedom, and morality, why don't you mend your own manners and look a little more at home?" Why were hon. Members to be freed from arrest—why did they not either pay their just debts or take the usual consequences of not doing so? When it was seen that all the virtuous indignation of the House was expended upon the receipt by a poor man of a small sum of money, while Members of their own body were allowed to be remunerated by thousands a year, the people would not believe in the sincerity of the course which they were pursuing—would not place confidence in this one-sided legislation—and would come to the conclusion that the question which the House really had in view was what the late William Cobbett quaintly called the question of the breeches pocket. He objected to this Bill on account of the numerous class of new offences it created, and on account of these offences being so described as not to be intelligible, he ventured to say, to one in 500 of those who read the Bill. If there was a measure which ought to have been put forward in a plain and intelligible manner, it was this; and yet, in spite of all the care bestowed upon it by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midhurst (Mr. Walpole), and the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk (Sir F. Kelly), he had never seen a measure passed through that House with respect to whose provisions there had been greater difference of opinions than had prevailed among hon. and right hon. Gentlemen upon both sides. The House had created a number of new offences, which he was quite confident the country would not go along with them in considering offences. It was only the other day that the noble Lord the Lord President of the Council had been asked whether, in the event of a gentleman, residing in a town where he was proposed for election, giving a breakfast to a number of his personal friends during the election, that would come under the definition of bribery and treating. The noble Lord, he understood, answered unhesitatingly that it would. Now, if such a thing as this were to be considered objectionable and wrong, and were to be made penal, he wanted to know how it could be otherwise than penal for the noble Lord, or any gentleman occupying his position, to give an entertainment—which every one in his position did give—to those who sat behind him in the House of Commons? Things ought to be called by their right names. You might call this only hospitality between gentlemen, but he wanted to know, if a Member was to declare that no entertainment which he might have given, or have partaken of, should have been given in consequence of or on account of his election, why the same restriction was not to be placed upon the noble Lord, or upon gentlemen in his position, when the entertainments they gave referred not to electors, but to Members of that House? Another still greater objection which he entertained to the Bill was, that no satisfactory tribunal was provided for the trial of offences which might be committed under this Act. If the noble Lord had contented himself with clearly defining the offences of bribery and treating, and had affixed to those offences any penalties he chose, he (Lord Hotham) should care not how stringent they were, and, if there had been appointed for the trial of such offences any tribunal which could by possibility command the public confidence, there would have been no individual in that House more ready than he would have been to go along with the noble Lord. But this was not the case in the present instance. Election Committees of that House, it was well known, decided frequently one way and another a different way, so that the public were inclined to place no great confidence in their decisions; and the question was often asked, to which party belonged the three Members who constituted the majority upon those Committees, with a view thereby of arriving at a conclusion as to what would be the probable result of their inquiry. For his own part, he should prefer to have questions connected with offences committed under the Bill referred to the Court of Common Pleas, inasmuch as he thought that a more satisfactory conclusion would thus be arrived at. Looking at the measure as a whole, he considered that it had been exceedingly well described by an hon. Friend of his, a Member of that House, who said that it would be a very good Bill if all the world consisted of Walpoles, but as that, unfortunately, was not the case, it would be utterly useless. Some persons would feel some hesitation in making the declaration required by the Bill, while others who possessed what the noble Lord opposite had very aptly termed "robust consciences" would take it, and pursue the even tenor of their way. For these reasons he could not give his consent to the third reading of the Bill.

SIR JOSHUA WALMSLEY said, the noble Lord the Member for the East Riding seemed to have an impression that accusations had been cast on hon. Members opposite, for the course they had taken upon this Bill. He (Sir J. Walmsley), at least, imputed no improper or interested motives to those who had introduced the Amendments, which had so mutilated this Bill. But he was bound to say, that the effect of those Amendments had been to legalise bribery. They had introduced a clause to render travelling expenses legal—one of the most fruitful sources of corruption, and which would render it difficult for any but rich men to obtain a seat in that House; and they now sought to introduce a system of reasonable refreshments, which meant neither more nor less than reasonable bribery. The history of our legislation on this subject had been one tissue of blunders—a mere pretence.

We had denounced bribery in the abstract, but provided no remedy but that which we knew would not work. The result of our legislation had been to punish the innocent with the guilty, by disfranchising whole constituencies. The present Bill, on its coming out of Committee, was calculated to reach the evil, and appeared to be introduced with a bonâ fide desire to secure purity at elections; but it was now of little, if of any, use for its professed purpose, and some of its provisions were absolutely injurious. The noble Lord had asked whether it was on pecuniary considerations that Liberal Members desired to prevent expenses, and intimated that it was simply a breeches pocket consideration. He now had to tell the noble Lord that it was a question of elevating or demoralising the constituencies, and he would ask the noble Lord upon what principle of right or justice those who were sent to this House by their fellow-men to represent their interests, and who did their duty, labouring almost night and day to serve their country without fee or reward, could be asked to pay for bringing voters to the poll, or treating them when they were there? He must repeat that he regarded the introduction of the clause to legalise travelling expenses, the payment of cabs, and the attempt to introduce reasonable refreshment, as fatal to the intention of the good working of the Bill, and as such he should not regret to see it defeated.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that the noble Lord (Lord Hotham) had no doubt with the utmost sincerity declared the reasons why he was not disposed to vote for the third reading of this Bill, but, at the same time, the course of argument which he had pursued was the course which was usually pursued by those who did not wish offences to be punished. It was usual to say, "If you are sincere in wishing to punish offences, why don't you take some other offence, there are many others which might have been selected without choosing this particular offence;" and that was precisely the course of argument pursued by the noble Lord. One statement made by the noble Lord was, that the public would not believe that the House of Commons was sincere in the endeavour to put down bribery and corrupt practices, because Members of that House enjoyed, among other things, the exemption of freedom from arrest for debt. The reason for that exemption was not on account of ancient privilege, but because it had been thought dangerous that the power of arrest should be given to any adversary, or, indeed, to any Minister of the Crown, for, if such power were to be given, then on occasions when it was expected that at some approaching division the numbers would be very close, an adversary or a Minister might inquire into the private circumstances of any Member who was likely to vote, and, even although he might not enforce his arrest, still he might by threats of arrest drive him away, and so prevent him from giving his vote. There was, he believed, great force in that argument, and he had never been able to consent to any proposal that Members of that House should be rendered liable to arrest. That was a subject, however, which might be brought forward at any time, and the noble Lord was at perfect liberty to introduce a Bill on the subject if he thought that privilege injurious, or one which ought to be abolished. There was no reason, however, why, because this privilege was not proposed to be abolished by the measure now before the House, this Bill for the prevention of bribery and corrupt practices should not be allowed to pass. With regard to the present Bill, the noble Lord had treated it as if it were a new attempt at direct legislation against the offence of bribery; whereas, in reality, a great part of the Bill was a mere consolidation of existing laws, and an attempt had been made in several clauses to define in clearer language than had hitherto been employed offences which were at present punishable under the existing law. On what ground could the noble Lord, then, find fault with him for proposing a Bill, which had for its object the consolidation of existing laws and the defining of offences already punishable by law? The Bill had been most carefully considered by a Select Committee of Gentlemen, of whom it could not be said that they were not sincere in their wish to put an end to bribery and corruption. The noble Lord had also stated that the public would say that the measure was an unjust one, that it did not mete out equal justice to the rich and to the poor, that the poor would be most severely treated by it, and that the rich were not dealt with in the same manner. That, however, was not the case. By the present Bill more penalties were placed upon the rich than had before existed, while those already placed on the poor were not in any way aggravated. There were two provisions in the Bill which applied especially to the candidates. One provision was with regard to undue influence and intimidation, which was an offence not likely to be committed by the poor, but, on the contrary, by the rich and powerful; and, for the first time, that offence was dealt with by the present Bill. Another part of the Bill provided that a declaration should be made by every Member of Parliament; whereas, up to the present time, it had been customary to require the bribery oath from voters—so that by the present measure the obligation was removed from the poor voters and placed upon a higher class of society—that was to say, upon those who sought and obtained a seat in that House, and, therefore, the Bill was not liable to the objection made by the noble Lord. With regard to the general merits of the Bill, he had already stated that by it the offences of bribery and treating were defined and existing laws consolidated, but there were also one or two alterations of the existing law of considerable importance, and for which the House was indebted to the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk (Sir F. Kelly). Every one knew that laws against bribery and treating were in the Statute-book, and that they were applied to a certain degree in certain instances, and it had happened that perhaps some thirty Gentlemen had lost their seats, and some fifty or sixty persons had been punished, while perhaps 200 other persons who were equally guilty entirely escaped. The hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk had proposed a clause which provided that all the expenses of an election should be regularly accounted for, and that an officer should be appointed to defray those accounts and to publish them. All persons had heard accounts of such enormous sums as 10,000*l.*, or even 15,000*l.*, spent in a contested election; but by having an account kept of all the expenses, in the manner proposed by the Bill, the public mind would be brought to bear on corrupt practices where they existed. Would the noble Lord assert that that would be an evil? Would the noble Lord say that in a small borough, where perhaps 6,000*l.* or 7,000*l.* had been spent in a contested election—and to spend such a sum there must be either bribery or enormous treating—it was not a fair enactment, that the money spent should be accounted for; or did he mean to say that the publication of the accounts would not act as a check upon corrupt practices? He would not argue the question with regard to the declaration required from Members of that House, and all he would say for the Bill was, that at the last election complaints of bribery and corrupt treating were general, and a great many Gentlemen had lost their seats on being petitioned against. That being the case, was it not right that the House of Commons should endeavour to afford some additional remedy? He hoped that the House would remember that he had endeavoured to deal with the subject of jurisdiction in election matters, but that, as it had been impossible for that Bill to pass through the Select Committee this Session, it had been deferred until next Session. With regard to the statement which had been made, that, when an Election Committee was appointed, persons immediately inquired on which side of the House the three Members of it sat, and on which the two, and from that generally anticipated the decision of the Committee, he could only say that such might be the case with suspicious persons, but he felt convinced that in general the statement was quite unfounded. The first instance he could remember was that of the noble Lord himself, who had, as Chairman of an Election Committee, felt no hesitation in voting for the unseating of a Member of his own party, in a case where corrupt practices had been proved. Would any one believe that the right hon. Member for Midhurst (Mr. Walpole) would be biassed in his decision by the fact of the Member petitioned against holding the same opinions as himself? He should be very sorry to see jurisdiction in election matters transferred to the Court of Common Pleas; for, if that course were adopted, he felt convinced that within two years imputations would be cast upon the impartiality of the Judges. The Bill was an attempt to correct an admitted evil, and there never had been a measure brought before that House which had undergone more discussion in detail, and, although the noble Lord might say that he was sincerely desirous of putting an end to bribery and corruption, he thought that if the House rejected all practical attempts to remedy the evil they would not get much credit for sincerity from the country. He trusted, therefore, that the House would consent to the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. ROBERT PALMER said, that no one in that House could feel more anxious to put down bribery than he did; but, at the same time, he must observe that the subject appeared to him to be one with which it was extremely difficult successfully to deal. He must also say that he thought the framers of the Bill had gone somewhat too far in declaring that the voter should not be allowed to receive any money for the purpose of defraying his travelling expenses, of procuring refreshment, or by way of remuneration for the loss of time which, in going to the place of polling, he must necessarily incur. There were some entirely new provisions in the Bill—he referred especially to those relating to the appointment of an election officer—and all its details were of a very complex kind, calculated to lead parties into the unintentional commission of offences. It was very questionable how the Bill would work, and he thought it would be advisable to make it an experimental measure. He would suggest, therefore, that a clause should be inserted at the end of the Bill continuing it till the month of August, 1855, or till the end of the next Session of Parliament. The effect of that would be to ensure the reconsideration of the subject. There were certain elections pending which would probably take place shortly after the passing of the Act, and if they made the Bill temporary they would have an opportunity of trying its effects in boroughs upon those cases. It was more than probable, also, that there would be a county election before the end of next Session, so that they would have an opportunity of seeing how the Bill would work in counties as well as in boroughs. He was not inclined to oppose the passing of the measure altogether, because, after so much had been said upon the subject of bribery and corruption, he could not but feel that they would expose themselves to the charge of a want of sincerity if they did not at least make an attempt to abate the evil.

Mr. COBDEN said, he rose to make a suggestion, which, he hoped, would be approved. Many of the objections which were entertained to the Bill as it now stood would be redressed, if some of those Amendments, of which notice had been given, were carried. The noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord R. Grosvenor) had announced his intention to move an Amendment to the effect that payments for travelling expenses should not be allowed. Now, speaking for himself, if that Motion were agreed to, it would remove many of the objections which he had to the Bill in its present shape; while, on the contrary, if the Motion were not adopted, he was not sure that he should vote for the passing of the Bill. Again, the objections entertained to the Bill by many hon. Gentlemen opposite had reference solely to the declaration contained in the Bill, and if the Amendment of which notice had been given with respect to that point were agreed to, the probability was, that those who objected to the declaration would vote for the passing of the Bill. Considering, then, that the proposed Amendments amounted to nearly six pages of print, he did not think they were in a position to take the sense of the House upon the general merits of the Bill, and he would, therefore, suggest to hon. Members that they should agree to the third reading, discuss the various Amendments, and take the sense of the House upon the Motion that the Bill do pass.

COLONEL SIBTHORP said, he would tell the hon. Member for the West Riding, who had just sat down, that old birds were not to be caught by chaff. For his part, he would offer to the Bill every opposition in his power. He believed it was a mere claptrap measure, brought forward by a Treasury Bench, which would require to purify itself before it undertook to cleanse other people, and at the same time it was a most disgraceful and uncharitable one. If doing a man's duty to his fellow-creatures was bribery, he had been guilty of it, and he should be guilty of it again, whatever were the laws they might pass. He was as opposed as anybody to bribery, and the employment of improper influence at elections, and he could assure the House that he had never controlled the votes of any tenant of his; but he decidedly disapproved of a measure such as that, which would interfere with the charities of life and the liberty of the subject.

Bill read 3^d.

On the Motion that the Bill do pass,

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD rose to move several new clauses, the effect of which would be to render unnecessary the appointment of an election officer, and simplify the details of the Bill. He objected to the appointment of an election officer, because he would, in almost every instance, be a partisan, and would favour and throw all his weight and influence into one scale—because his duties were not very clearly defined, and would be of little use save in one particular—and because it was not advisable to create a new paid functionary, if they could by any possibility dispense with his nomination. Every advantage which could be obtained by the nomination of an election officer would be secured by the simple plan which he proposed. He understood from the Bill as it now stood, that the sole duty of the election officer would be to receive money from the candidates, and to pay such accounts as the candidates should admit to be due. Now, in place of that officer, he proposed that every person on his becoming a candidate—and the period at which he becomes a candidate was defined—should nominate an election agent to be his election agent for the payment of his election expenses, and should forthwith advertise such nomination in the newspaper of the county or borough where the election was held. By another clause he provided that every candidate should pay all his election expenses through his own agent. He further proposed that the agent should be required to keep a book, to be called the "Election Expenses Book," and upon the receipt or payment of any sum, should record it in full in such book, stating from whom received, and for what purpose—to whom paid, and for what purpose—and giving in every instance the date of each payment. Another clause provided that the agent should, at the expiration of one month after the election, furnish to the returning officer a copy of the entries in his Election Expenses Book, together with all the receipts and vouchers in his possession, and accompanied by a declaration as to its accuracy. He further proposed that the candidate himself should, at the expiration of two months after the election, furnish a detailed account of his expenses to the returning officer, accompanied by a declaration to the effect that, according to his knowledge, information, and belief, no payment had been made which was not to be found in the account so furnished. He likewise proposed to oblige the returning officer to publish that account in the newspapers circulated in the place where the election was held, thus securing the only thing which the Bill did secure—publicity to the election expenses of each candidate. He would conclude by moving his first clause.

"Every candidate, immediately after he shall have become such, and before he shall pay or agree to pay any part of the election expenses, shall, by writing under his hand, appoint some person to be his agent for the payment of such expenses, and such candidate may at any time by writing under his hand dismiss such agent, and appoint another in his place; and it shall be the duty of such candidate immediately after such appointment to give notice thereof in writing to the Returning Officer, and in such notice to state the name, description, and residence of the agent, and within one week after every such appointment to cause such notice to be inserted in some newspaper circulating in the place where the election is held; and no other than the agent so appointed shall have authority to pay or expend any money for or in respect of the election expenses."— brought up, and read 1^o.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he trusted the House would not at this stage of the measure be induced to assent to the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman. It would be perceived at once that the first object of that proposal was to sweep away the whole system of the appointment and action of the election officer. Now, it should be remembered that the principle on which the election officer should be appointed, and the nature of the duties to be imposed, had received the most serious consideration from the Select Committee, had been unanimously adopted by them, and subsequently approved by large majorities of that House. It was quite true with regard to the declaration considerable difference of opinion had prevailed, and that the majority which had approved the declaration had not been so large as when the general principle of an election officer had been adopted. But he could not suppose that, after the question had been so well considered by the Select Committee and by the House, the House would be induced at that late period of the Session to adopt an entirely new and unconsidered system. The objections to the clauses of the hon. and learned Gentleman lay even on the surface, for, instead of appointing an election officer, independent of the candidates, he proposed to vest the powers of the Bill in individuals appointed exclusively by the candidates themselves, and, of course, under their control. Again, the hon. and learned Gentleman proposed a single agent to transact all the business of the election, and pay away the moneys of the candidates, instead of an election officer, who would receive the assistance of as many agents as the candidates found to be necessary. There were other objections quite as obvious. As the Bill stood, the election officer was to see to the application of the whole money, and it was absolutely impossible, without something amounting morally to perjury, which would be severely punishable, for candidates to apply funds in an illegal manner. But if these clauses were adopted, bribery might be practised on as large a scale as hitherto, thousands of pounds might be advanced for corrupt purposes by any one who knew they might get repaid by the candidate after all accounts had been verified; or money might be deposited for the use of secret agents. In truth, there would be no security whatever against the application of money in bribery and corrupt practices. He therefore hoped the House would reject the proposal of the hon. and learned Member.

MR. TATTON EGERTON said, he did not wonder that the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just addressed the House was very anxious for the passing of his favourite clauses. But he (Mr. Egerton) could not understand the objections of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and should, therefore, support the clause of the hon. and learned Member for Ennis.

MR. J. BALL said, he hoped his hon. and learned Friend would not persevere with his clause. Its practical result would be to substitute for an impartial agent a man who was identical with the very men through whose agency every description of corruption had existed in this country. It would be going back to the old and corrupt system which had prevailed at Cambridge, Canterbury, Maldon, and other places. Wherever corruption had existed it was by means of election agents, and yet these were the men to whom the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. J. D. Fitzgerald) affected to look as the faithful protectors of the purity of election.

MR. HENLEY said, he understood the object of the proposal clause to be to get rid of third persons, who were, according as the Bill now stood, to be appointed as election officers. The agent by this Amendment was not required to give any opinion as to the legality or illegality of any payment; he was simply to be the machine for paying the expenses of the candidate, and for examining the accounts. He did not see that there would be any additional security in requiring a declaration that the money had been handed over to an election officer; the only difference that he could see would be that the candidate would in the one case have to pay 50*l.* or 60*l.* less than in the other.

MR. MURROUGH said, he was opposed to the adoption of the clause on the ground that it rendered it compulsory on the candidate to employ an agent. There were many boroughs, the constituencies of which were almost all operatives, and in which it would therefore be difficult to find a person competent to act as an agent.

Mr. MALINS said, he thought the hon. Member who had last addressed the House paid the operatives a bad compliment when he said that a candidate would be unable to find one among them whom he could trust with his money. For his part, he had not so bad an opinion of his countrymen of any class, and he believed that, even in the smallest boroughs, many persons could be found to whom candidates might safely intrust their electioneering arrangements. The clause proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. J. D. FitzGerald) had this advantage over the one which stood in the Bill—that, while it secured publicity, it gave candidates a voice in the disposal of their money.

Mr. MURROUGH said, he must protest against the unfair construction which the hon. and learned Member had put upon his words.

Mr. VINCENT SCULLY said, he considered it impossible to obtain an election officer in Ireland who would not be a partisan; and as all the advantages to be derived from that officer being appointed would be equally derived by appointing the agent of the candidate to perform the duties, he hoped the House would agree to the clause.

Mr. BRIGHT said, the objection of the hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) that the candidate would be put to an expense of 50*l.* or 60*l.* for the election officer was met by the fact, that the same amount of money must be given to the election agent proposed to be substituted. He preferred the original clause, because he thought the whole matter would come before the public with far greater appearance of reality and truth if it came through the hands of a public officer intended to be, and assured to be in a majority of cases, an impartial administrator of the duties which devolved upon him. A candidate was by this clause forced to appoint an agent whether he wanted one or not, and if any corruption was intended they knew precisely what sort of agent would be likely to be chosen. He thought an election agent as existing in this country was an animal not of the cleanest character, and where a candidate required unscrupulous conduct he would select one of unscrupulous character. Although he was quite willing to admit, whatever conclusion was arrived at as to this appointment, it would not answer effectually for the object in view; yet, as the adoption of the clause of the hon. and learned Member for Ennis would be fatal to the project of carrying the Bill this Session, and as he was quite sure the public would be better satisfied with the provisions as they stood, he trusted the House would not agree to the Amendments of the hon. and learned Member.

Mr. J. D. FITZGERALD said, that, after the decision just arrived at by the House, he would not proceed with his other clauses.

LORD ADOLPHUS VANE TEMPEST said, the clause he now begged to propose he had moved on a previous occasion, and then the hon. and learned Attorney General made a statement which showed that, under the existing law, candidates might be made responsible for the acts of unauthorised persons. The hon. and learned Gentleman stated that, at one of his elections, he was asked to sanction the payment of the expenses of out-voters. To this the hon. and learned Gentleman demurred, because doubt prevailed in his mind as to the legality of such payments; and, although he was disposed to think them legal, he was determined to incur no risk. The hon. and learned Gentleman, therefore, refused to sanction the payment, but it had been made by a friend, and the Committee had held that it was legal. He would now ask whether, if they had held it to be illegal, the hon. and learned Gentleman would not have been held answerable for the act, although he had disowned it? A gentleman who had conformed to this Act, and taken the declaration, might afterwards be held liable by a Committee for a proceeding of one of his committeemen, a rash friend, or an enemy in disguise who wished to injure him. This was not a position in which any hon. Member ought to be placed. Since he had last brought this question under the notice of the House, he had been favoured by the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Napier), who was Chairman of the Dungarvon Election Committee, with a copy of the judgment he had delivered in favour of the sitting Member. It had been contended that the act of one of his committeemen was sufficient to unseat him, but the Chairman of the Committee said he did not think a single act of corrupt treating committed against the authority of the candidate, and not sanctioned by him, ought to have the effect of unseating him and preventing him from representing that constituency again in the same Parliament. He (Lord A. Vane Tempest) had suffered at an election from the act of a man which he had neither authorised nor sanctioned; but if this Bill were passed, and hon. Members were required to take the declaration it contained, they ought only to be held answerable for their own acts and the acts of their certified agents.

Clause—

"Every Candidate, or in his absence, the persons proposing and seconding such person, shall, before or at the nomination, or as soon after as conveniently may be, make and subscribe before the Returning Officer the following Declaration:—

"I, A. B. [or we the Proposer and Seconder of A. B.], do solemnly and sincerely declare that I [or we] have given a true and faithful Return of every Agent or Agents authorised or sanctioned by me [or us] to make any payments of money or monies, previous to or at my [or his] Election, and that no other than such Agent or Agents so named have had, nor shall in future have, authority or sanction by me [or us] to expend any money or monies, or incur any expenses of or relating to the Election aforesaid; and that I [or we] have faithfully adhered to the requirements contained in Clause 32 of this Act."

"No person being a Candidate at any Election, or who shall hereafter be elected, who shall have made the Declaration required by Section — of this Act, and have conformed thereto, and who shall not have appointed or given any authority to any agent or agents save according to the provisions of Section — of this Act, and who shall in all things have well and truly conformed to the provisions herein contained against bribery and all other corrupt and unlawful practices, shall be personally liable, civilly or criminally, nor shall his election be avoided, by reason of any illegal acts done by any other person than himself or his agent or agents, named in writing and notified to the Election Officer, according to the provisions of this Act, unless such illegal act shall be proved to have been done by his authority or sanction: Provided always, that nothing herein contained shall be deemed to make valid any Election which shall be proved to have been obtained or effected by means of bribery, or any other corrupt or illegal practices,"—

brought up, and read 1^o.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the effect of the noble Lord's clause, which had been discussed and negatived on a previous occasion, was, that, whereas at present if the agent of a sitting Member committed any act of bribery, the sitting Member was held responsible for it, and lost his seat in consequence, the candidate should only be responsible for the acts of the agent whom he had acknowledged. The object of the House in passing this Bill was to make the law against bribery more stringent than it had hitherto been, but the noble Lord's proposition, if adopted by the House, would have an exactly contrary effect, and would make the bribery laws more lax and open the door to a greater amount of bribery than was at present practised. When he had adverted to the case of his own election, he had not done so with respect to the law of agency, but with respect to that of travelling expenses. The noble Lord had charged him with ignorance—with not knowing the law. He did not know any one who professed so much modesty as the noble Lord. He was constantly begging the House to excuse his presumption, but he must say that he knew no one in that House, young or old, who was so apt to charge others with presumption and ignorance as the noble Lord. This was the second time the noble Lord had thought proper, without any provocation upon his part, to attack him personally and individually with reference to his election. If the noble Lord had examined the matter, he would have found that there had been numerous conflicting decisions upon it, and, although the balance of authority had been that travelling expenses were legal, yet, as there had been contradictory decisions—and he also, upon general principles, entertained serious doubts as to the legality of the practice—he thought it right, not only as a public man whose character was before the country, but also for the sake of not invalidating his election, to desire that the voters in question should not be fetched to the polling place. They were fetched notwithstanding, but it had never occurred to him to say that he was not responsible for that act, for he knew that by the law of Parliament a candidate was responsible for those who were held by the Committee to be his agents. Although there had been many conflicting decisions as to what constituted agency, all Committees had proceeded upon the principle that where general agency had been established, it was not necessary to prove direct authority from the candidate for any particular act. He hoped the House would not recede from the decision at which it had already arrived upon this point, as, if they required direct authority to be proved for each particular act of corruption, they would have bribery committed without a possibility of its being brought home to the candidate.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he could not allow this debate to go on without noticing the attack which had just been made upon his noble Friend the Member for North Durham (Lord A. Vane Tempest) by the hon. and learned Attorney General. He (Sir John Pakington) had heard nothing fall from his noble Friend which could be construed in the nature of a personal attack, and the sneers which had been directed against him by the hon. and learned Attorney General were most uncourteous and uncalled for. Perhaps he could not better express his impartial opinion on this matter, than by stating that he had turned round to his hon. and learned Friend the Member for East Suffolk, and was remarking to him how good and agreeable was the tone of his noble Friend. [Laughter.] He maintained that that was an impartial opinion, for he could not anticipate that this attack was about to be made. Certainly he heard no attack made upon the Attorney General. [THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: The noble Lord charged me with ignorance of the law.] He had not understood his noble Friend to make such a charge. He must say, however, that the complaint against his noble Friend for having twice brought forward substantially the same question came with singularly bad grace from a Member of the Government who had very recently on the Oxford University Bill taken the sense of the House on propositions which the House had before rejected on two different occasions. With regard to the clause of his noble Friend, it appeared to him to be strictly just. It might in some degree open the door to bribery, but that would be as nothing compared with the settlement of the present state of the law.

MR. J. BALL said, he was much surprised that the right hon. Gentleman, who had often acted as Chairman of an Election Committee, should support a clause like the one under discussion, the effect of which would be that no amount of bribery would vitiate an election unless it was connected directly with the candidate. [Cries of "Divide!"] He thought after the display of pugnacity they had had among the English Members, they might allow an Irishman quietly to discuss the Bill. He should oppose the clause.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he thought a very reasonable meaning could be put upon the clause submitted by his noble Friend. He must deny that it was intended to legalise any election where corrupt practices were committed, either by the candidate or any other person not connected with or authorised by him. If, however, it should be shown that any single elector had been bribed by any party who had no connection whatever with the candidate, he thought it would be most unfair to visit that upon the candidate, who might have been returned by a majority of upwards of 100. He agreed that it would be extremely inconvenient if a candidate at any election, who had employed an agent, and had given him a general authority, should not be held civilly responsible, and also responsible for his seat, for the acts of that agent, although he had not authorised him to do any of the illegal acts which might have been committed by him. In practice, the candidate was held responsible, and justly so, for the acts of his agent; but what right had they to visit upon the candidate the offences of a man with whom he had no connection? All he asked was, that the House should throw its shield over innocent persons, because it too often happened that Committees, puzzled by the speeches of counsel, had come to very harsh and unfair decisions in these cases.

MR. BRIGHT said, if this clause were agreed to, one great check which at present existed to prevent bribery by over-zealous partisans would be taken away. He knew two cases—in one, the brother-in-law of a candidate gave a voter 10*l.* to leave the town—in the other, a friend gave a voter 5*l.* to vote for a particular candidate, and, in both cases, he believed, without the knowledge of the candidates. The only check which at present existed on such proceedings was the knowledge, on the part of the partisans, that such acts would jeopardise the seat of their candidate. If the seat were not voided by them, then there would no longer be any inducement to search out such cases, and thus a great avenue to bribery would be opened up. He was sorry to vote against the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir F. Kelly), who had shown himself most anxious to put down bribery, but he could not support the present proposition.

MR. HENLEY said, he considered the clause to be necessary on account of the provisions of Clause 35. Having by that clause made it incumbent upon candidates to give the names of their agents, they ought to be protected from the acts of other persons.

Lord ADOLPHUS VANE TEMPEST said, he disclaimed any intention of having for a moment intended to charge the Attorney General with ignorance of the law. Had he done so, he should, indeed, have been worthy of the very severe observations which the hon. and learned Gentleman had made with regard to him.

The House divided:—Ayes 79; Noes 114: Majority 35.

SIR FITZROY KELLY then moved the following clause—

"If any candidate at any election, or any Member hereafter returned to serve in Parliament, shall, before the passing of this Act, have paid any money for or in respect of any election hereafter to be held, or any expenses thereof, such person shall, to the best of his ability, deliver a full, true, and particular account of such payment or payments to the election officer, and may thereupon, instead of the declaration hereinbefore contained, make and subscribe the declaration following:—'I [A. B.] do solemnly and sincerely declare that I have not knowingly made, authorised, or sanctioned, and that I will not at any time hereafter knowingly make, authorise, or sanction, any payment on account of my election, otherwise than through the election officer, save as excepted and allowed by the "Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854," and other than the payment or payments mentioned in a certain account called "Reform Act Account," delivered by me to the election officer, nor have knowingly done, authorised, sanctioned, procured, or promised, nor will hereafter knowingly do, authorise, sanction, procure, or promise any act, matter, or thing contrary to the provisions contained in sections 2 and 4 of the said Act;' and any person who shall make and subscribe any such declaration knowing the same to be untrue, or, having made and subscribed such declaration, shall, at any time thereafter, knowingly make, authorise, or sanction any payment contrary to the true intent and meaning of such declaration, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and in Scotland of an offence punishable with fine and imprisonment."

Mr. VERNON SMITH said, he considered that the preferable course would be to treat all payments made before this Act as innocent payments; and the case might be better met by inserting in the declaration the words, "since the passing of the Corrupt Practices Act."

Mr. VINCENT SCULLY said, he also thought that the simplest plan would be not to make the Act retrospective, but to let the declaration merely be, that the candidate had paid no money since the passing of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he thought that it was indispensable that the clause should be inserted in its present form.

Mr. CRAUFURD would suggest that if the present clause were passed, and the clause containing the declaration, notice to omit which had been given, did not pass, they would then be placed in a strange position.

SIR FITZROY KELLY replied that, in the event of the declaration clause not being passed, he would then, with the permission of the House, withdraw the present clause.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Mr. PHINN said, he would now beg to move the insertion after Clause 38 of the clause of which he had given notice. The clause had been taken from the previous Acts against bribery and treating, the only alteration made being that the Member should not sit in the then Parliament; but if it were desired, he should have no objection to the clause being limited as to the place for which the election was declared void.

Clause,

"If any Candidate shall be declared by any Election Committee guilty, by himself or his agents, of bribery, treating, or undue influence at any Election, such Candidate shall be incapable of being re-elected for the place for which his Election shall have been declared void during the Parliament then in existence."

Brought up, and read 1°; 2°.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he would consent to the insertion of the clause, as its object was to keep the law as it had hitherto stood with reference to this subject.

SIR FITZROY KELLY suggested, that after the word "elected" should be inserted the words, "for the place for which his election has been declared void."

Mr. BENTINCK moved the insertion of the words, "with his cognisance," after the words "or his agents."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he must oppose the addition, because he considered that by the present law a Member guilty of bribery by his agents, with or without his cognisance, was disqualified from sitting for the same place in the same Parliament.

Mr. BRIGHT said, he thought the Member should be disqualified from being returned in the same Parliament for any place, otherwise there would be merely an exchange of seats.

Mr. PHINN said, the Member might be unseated for the acts of his agent, of which he had no cognisance; and it would be too great a penalty to disqualify him entirely for the whole duration of the Parliament.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and negatived.

Clause amended, read 3°, and added.

Mr. MULLINGS said, he had now a clause to bring forward which he trusted the House would adopt.

Clause—

"On the trial of any action for recovery of any pecuniary penalty under this Act, the parties to such action, and the husbands and wives of such parties respectively, shall be competent and compellable to give evidence in the same manner as parties, and their husbands and wives, are competent and compellable to give evidence in actions and suits under the Act of the fourteenth and fifteenth Victoria, chapter ninety-nine, and 'The Evidence Amendment Act, 1853,' but subject to and with the exceptions contained in such several Acts: Provided always, That any such evidence shall not thereafter be used in any indictment or criminal proceeding under this Act, against the party giving it."

Brought up, and read 1°; 2°; 3°.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he would not object to the propositions involved in this clause, that parties proceeded against for penalties under this Bill should be allowed to come forward as witnesses, and to give what evidence they could in their own behalf; but, of course, there ought to be reciprocity, and they consequently should be liable to be called upon the other side as well as competent to be heard upon their own. He must, however, own that he had felt some reluctance in admitting the clause, because it would be an exception to the general law of the land, for it was not the law of the land at present that the parties proceeded against in a penal action might give evidence in their own behalf. At all events it was a doubtful question, inasmuch as in the Court of Exchequer, in which the question had been raised, the Judges had been equally divided in opinion. He thought, therefore, that any legislation on the subject should be general rather than exceptional, and he should propose a clause in the Common Law Procedure Act with that object, which, if the House should agree to it, would render this clause superfluous. If the House should not agree to it, he owned he should have some hesitation in admitting the principle in an exceptional case. At the same time he quite agreed that if even under any circumstances parties were entitled to be heard in their own behalf, they were so entitled in cases such as these; and he should not oppose the hon. Gentleman's proposal.

Mr. GOULBURN said, he saw no reason why different rules of evidence should prevail with respect to cases arising under this Act from those which were applicable to any other penal proceeding. If the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General intended to apply the principle involved in this clause to all penal actions, of course his objection fell to the ground; but then the best way would be to do it by a general enactment, for he thought it very objectionable to apply different rules to different cases of the same class.

Mr. HILDYARD said, he wished the House to consider whether this clause might not be the means of compelling timid Members, who did not like to undergo the ordeal of examination in a court of justice, to compromise penal actions against them. In a recent case, a friend of his had told him that he would rather pay 1,000*l.* than be "badgered by the lawyers," but he had appeared upon his advice, and those who were proceeding against him had immediately retired.

Mr. HENLEY said, he agreed very much with the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Goulburn) that exceptional legislation was unwise. He would much rather let it rest upon the general law.

SIR FITZROY KELLY hoped the hon. Member for Cirencester would persevere with the clause. Before Election Committees parties were competent witnesses, and might either be compelled to give evidence or give it voluntarily; and there was no reason why the same rule should not be extended to other proceedings under this Act.

Mr. CRAUFURD said, he approved of the clause, but disapproved of dealing with the subject exceptionally. He wished to know whether the parties would be compellable as well as competent to give evidence.

Mr. MULLINGS said, he would insert the word "compellable" in addition to the word "competent."

Mr. PHINN would propose that the proviso be admitted.

SIR FITZROY KELLY: Would you compel a man to give evidence, and make him criminate himself?

Question put, "That the clause be added to the Bill."

The House divided :—Ayes 118; Noes 107; Majority 11.

MR. BENTINCK said, he would now move, in page 3, line 37, after the words "and of none effect," to insert the words. "Provided always, that such treating shall have taken place within a period of six months, either previous or subsequent to an election." He thought the clause as it stood much too stringent against all persons mixed up in an election. He did not think that treating for corrupt purposes would ever take place at a period distant from the election, it being more than probable that it would take place either a short time previous to, or subsequent to it. Having now many years' experience in Parliamentary proceedings, he must say he never knew of a single instance of a candidate habitually treating or corrupting his would-be constituents. With a view, therefore, to prevent actions being brought against Members or their agents during an unlimited and indefinite period subsequent to an election, for acts which might or might not have been done with a corrupt intention, he should move the foregoing Amendment.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he thought the hon. Gentleman, by putting a wrong construction on the Act, had come to a false conclusion. The law in reference to the clause as it at present stood went quite as far on the subject of corrupt practices as the clause proposed; and the new Bill would no more make the giving of a glass of beer penal, unless it was given with a corrupt intention, than the present law.

MR. ARCHIBALD HASTIE said, 'he hoped the noble Lord would still agree to the Amendment, for unless it were accepted he should feel bound to vote against the declaration.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, that, on the contrary, he hoped the noble Lord would not agree to the Amendment. If the hon. Member for Paisley would read the clause, he would find it only applied to the case of persons giving refreshments in order to corruptly influencing a constituency. If the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bentinck) were agreed to, the effect would be that candidates would tell the electors, "If you only elect me, I promise you a first-rate feed at the end of six months." So that all the difficulties consequent upon treating would be thus easily surmounted.

The House divided :—Ayes 78; Noes 153; Majority 75.

MR. HILDYARD said, he would beg to move the omission of the words at the commencement of the 6th clause, which imposes certain disabilities for bribery, for the avowed purpose of expunging that clause from the Bill. He considered the 6th and 7th clauses most objectionable. He did not propose to expunge these clauses when the Bill was in Committee, because he thought it desirable to discuss them in the presence of Mr. Speaker, as they materially affected the privileges of the House of Commons. Every Member convicted of bribery under the 6th clause, or of treating and undue influence under the 7th, would forfeit his seat. The question of transferring the jurisdiction over seats had been over and over again discussed in that House, and one great statesman, now no more, had contended that it was absolutely essential to the independence of the House to retain that jurisdiction; but by these two clauses the House was about to transfer it collaterally and incidentally to a petty jury in an assize town. When these clauses were discussed the Committee were under a misapprehension, believing that the law of the land was what it would become under these clauses, and that the 2 Geo. II. imposed a penalty of 500*l.*, and forfeited the seat of the Member who might be convicted. That Act, after imposing the penalty, said—

"And also shall be for ever disabled to hold, exercise, or enjoy any office or franchise to which he or they then shall or at any time afterwards may be entitled, as a Member of any city, borough, town corporate, or cinque port, as if such person were naturally dead."

But this clause did not apply to Members. It merely deprived capital burgesses, &c., of any franchise which they might possess. Several actions might be brought against a Member under this Bill, and though he should be acquitted in ten cases out of eleven, by a decision against him in the eleventh case he would be deprived of his seat. Let them consider what the effect of such a measure would be in Ireland, if hon. Gentlemen on one side of the House were tried by a Papist jury, and hon. Gentlemen on the other side were tried by an Orange jury. Party feeling, however, was so bitter in that country, that he was afraid hon. Gentlemen on both sides would seek to retain this power as an instrument of mutual obstruction; but, surely, the House did not wish that it should be so used, and he trusted the noble Lord would consider whether he should persevere in passing a clause which would produce such an effect. Might they not have introduced into England, by a clause of this kind, something of the same sort? The result, also, might be that guilty persons would compromise such actions, whereas in other cases it might lead to the conviction of innocent persons. By expunging the clause they would not subject themselves to any difficulty, for they could, if necessary, expel a guilty person, as had been done in a particular case in 1812. His hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General had said, on a former occasion, that if a verdict were unsatisfactory the Judge would certify the fact, and there would be a new trial; but he concluded that such a clause would be most mischievous in excited times. Did they think that the Judges would wish to place themselves in a position of hostility to that excitement, and expose themselves to the abuse of the newspapers as persons screening corruption? The Judges would leave the case to the jury in nine cases out of ten; and was it to such a tribunal they were going to transfer their privileges? With this view, he proposed that the words should be omitted, considering that, if the House assented to his Motion, the two clauses would ultimately be withdrawn.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, he would second the Amendment, because he thought that the effect of the clause, as it at present stood, would be that which the Lord President had, on a previous discussion, greatly deprecated, namely, to transfer these political questions to the jurisdiction of the civil courts, and to make these courts the arena of political discussions. Resort would be had to these actions after a hotly contested election in order to unseat the successful candidate; a man might have forty successive actions brought against him, and it was rather hard to say that if one of them should succeed—and it must be remembered that in these civil cases juries were bound to decide according to the weight of evidence, and could not give the benefit of a doubt to the accused party—he would be incapacitated from taking his seat in that House. It might happen, too, that the jury would be actuated by political feeling. There was every reason to believe that these proceedings would be made not unfrequently the instruments of political animosity, and he certainly thought they ought to remove the temptation to institute them which would be found in the fact that a successful action or prosecution would be a political triumph. It must not be forgotten, too, that this clause would alter the constitution of the House by transferring to another tribunal—and that too of a common jury—the power of determining who were and who were not to sit in that House. He believed that such a course would be destructive of the independence of the House, and he warned the puritans—or he might call them the would-be puritans—of that House, that, by adopting the clause as it stood now, they would be striking a deadly blow on its constitution, its safety, and its character. He was perfectly willing to confess that the arguments used against this clause would apply with tenfold force against its operation in Ireland. In that country he was sorry to be obliged to admit, there existed much ill-regulated political animosity, which, as had been shown in the course of this Session, would not hesitate to use any means to injure a political opponent, without stopping to inquire whether they were honourable or just. If this Amendment were unsuccessful, he should certainly feel it his duty to move that Ireland be exempted from the operation of the Bill.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, that although he could not participate in the apprehension that jurymen in England could ever become political partisans, there was really so much weight in the observations of the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down respecting the clause, and also in what had been urged by the hon. and learned Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Hildyard), that he felt it to be his duty to call the attention of the noble Lord opposite to the effect of those clauses as they then stood if adopted. These clauses, when considered in connection with the whole Bill, would be found objectionable. The clause moved by the hon. and learned Member for Bath (Mr. Phinn), providing that where an Election Committee declared a candidate guilty of bribery, he should be incapable of sitting in that House during the same Parliament, was a perfectly consistent clause; but by the clauses now under discussion, if a penal action was commenced against any candidate, not for bribery, but for the most insignificant offence under this Bill, he would, if judgment was given against him, be disentitled to sit and vote during the remainder of that Parliament. Now the difficulty was, that there was no machinery provided by this Bill for giving effect to any such decision—there was no penalty attached to his voting or sitting in that House, and no authority in the hands of Mr. Speaker, or otherwise, to prevent his doing that which the law declared he was not entitled to do. Under these circumstances, and seeing that in the other clauses of the Bill there were ample punishments attached to the different offences mentioned in the Bill, he would suggest to the noble Lord President that he should consider the propriety of striking out these two clauses altogether.

MR. PHINN said, he must confess that he felt the force of some of the objections which had been stated by the hon. and learned Gentlemen who had spoken on these clauses. As to there being no machinery for giving effect to decisions of the courts of law against Members of that House, the transmission of copies of such decisions to Mr. Speaker would render it necessary for that House to expel such Members. No machinery in such cases was necessary; the usage of Parliament was sufficient to meet the exigency. If a Member of that House was guilty of forgery, or declared insolvent, he must, ipso facto, be expelled. As to the danger of loose charges being got up against Members by common informers, that was guarded against by the clause introduced by the hon. Member for Cirencester (Mr. Mullings). With regard to the case of conviction on indictment, the penalty of disability, if severe, was limited to the duration of the existing Parliament.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he owned that the arguments of the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk (Sir F. Kelly), and the hon. and learned Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Hildyard), appeared to him to have such weight in them, that he could hardly ask the House to go on with these clauses. There was certainly a case that he (Lord J. Russell) had not considered, namely, that a Select Committee of that House, appointed to try the question of the validity of an election, might find the sitting Member not to be guilty of bribery by himself or his agents, and award the seat to him; and it might happen that an indictment might be got up by persons with strong political feelings the other way, and there might be a conviction on which it would be almost incumbent on that House to expel the Member. Then it might be a question for the House whether it would follow the decision of its own Committee, which had tried the case and heard witnesses upon oath, or whether it would be satisfied with the verdict of a jury. Certainly the general principle was against giving to juries the power of deciding on the right of Members to sit in that House; and on the whole, although he would not say that these clauses could not be defended, yet he felt that there was so much difficulty attending them that he thought it would be better that the House should expunge them.

MR. SOTHERON said, he thought the noble Lord was quite right in abandoning these clauses.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, he wished to explain that there was some objection to agreeing to these clauses in the Select Committee, and it was only the positive assertion of the noble Lord that the exclusion of the Member should last during the continuance of the same Parliament was the existing law (which was now shown to have been a misconception), that had reconciled the Members of the Committee to their insertion. The speech of the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk was not only fatal to these clauses, but, in his belief, fatal to the whole Bill, because it showed that there had been a want of consideration of the bearing of its different provisions until the House had adopted its clauses.

Clause 18 (Appointment of the Election Officer).

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he had asked the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for East Suffolk, on a previous occasion, whether there should not be a clause for the immediate appointment of the persons who were to be election officers for the boroughs of which the writs were suspended. The hon. and learned Gentleman then said, he thought this might be best done by the Secretary of State writing to the returning officers of those places, to say that the election officer ought to be immediately appointed. This, however, he (Lord J. Russell) thought would not be a regular or a constitutional way of effecting this object, and he wished to suggest that immediately after the words, "Be it enacted," in this clause, these words should be inserted—"That within six days after the passing of this Act the returning officers of Maldon, Barnstaple, Canterbury, Cambridge, and Kingston-upon-Hull"—and then the clause would run on—"once in every year in the month of August" should appoint an election officer.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY next proposed that the nomination of the election officer be not vested in the returning officer, as he considered that officer was open to undue influence. He thought the judicial officer both in Ireland and in Scotland would be a fitter person to nominate than the returning officer. He proposed to give the power of nomination to persons not open to influence—to the senior county court judges in England, who were barristers, and who had a large income from the country. In Ireland, to the assistant barristers; and in Scotland, to the sheriff's substitute.

Amendment proposed, in page 7, lines 25 and 26, to leave out the words "the Returning Officer of every," and to insert the words "in England the County Court Judge, or, if more than one, the senior County Court Judge in order of appointment; in Ireland, the Assistant Barrister; and in Scotland, the Sheriff's Substitute, having jurisdiction for or in any," instead thereof.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he did not think the alterations as proposed in any way desirable. To vest such a power in judicial officers would be very impolitic, and might, and probably would, in many instances, give rise to suspicions which it would be very unwise to associate with any judicial office. Hitherto, we had always endeavoured to keep our Judges free from political bias or influence, and to infringe upon so healthy a rule would be highly injudicious.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he did not think, as far as Scotland was concerned, that the alteration in favour of the sheriff's substitute would be a desirable one.

MR. J. BALL said, he considered that in Ireland, as well as elsewhere, the returning officers might often be strong partisans, and would suggest that it would, therefore, be advisable to admit of an appeal being made, under certain circumstances, to the Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Various verbal Amendments were then agreed to.

which was to render the payment by a candidate of the travelling expenses of a voter illegal. He hoped that the noble Lord the President of the Council, considering the great difference of opinion which existed on the subject, would not oppose the Amendment with the weight of the Government. If the Amendment were agreed to, it was his intention to propose an addition to the clause, attaching a penalty for the payment of travelling expenses.

Amendment proposed, in page 10, line 33, after the word "shall" to insert the word "not."

Question put, "That the word 'not' be there inserted."

The House divided:—Ayes 68; Noes 147: Majority 79.

MR. CAYLEY moved the following proviso to the end of the travelling expenses clause—

"Provided always, that unless the distance of the voter's residence to the nearest polling booth exceed one mile and a half, the conveyance of a voter to the poll shall not be a reasonable and legal expense within the meaning of this Act."

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he must oppose the Amendment. A person of infirm health might live at a less distance than a mile and a half, and he thought that, on the whole, it was better to retain the clause as it stood.

LORD ROBERT GROSVENOR said, he regarded the clause as it stood as highly mischievous, while it settled nothing as to what the present state of the law was. The effect of it would be, to compel every candidate engaged in a contest to convey every voter to the poll.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and negatived.

MR. HENLEY said, he wished to observe, with respect to the declaration required by the 37th clause to be made by every candidate, and also by every Member, that it imposed upon hon. Members what he believed no hon. Member could conscientiously undertake to pledge himself to. The declaration went back for sixty years, and went forward for 1,000 years. It was a declaration that they never had done, and never would commit, any one of 736 offences. [Loud laughter.] Yes; there were no less than 736 offences of bribery, which might be, either directly or indirectly, committed. Now he, for one, would never consent to make a declaration with respect to anything that he did not understand. Without any further remark, therefore, he should move that this clause be struck out of the Bill.

Amendment proposed, in page 14, line 29, to leave out from the word "Candidates" to the words "I [A. B.] do solemnly," in line 37.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that a most unusual course had been taken in their proceedings that night. They ought first to have decided upon the principle whether there should be any declaration or not, before they were called upon to say what that declaration should be. He could not assent to the declaration, which he confessed he could not understand. Nothing should ever induce him to take it as it was now worded. How did they know what the second and fourth sections of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act contained?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that the declaration which the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Pakington) had put upon the paper, and intended to move, appeared to be preferable to that now in the Bill, and, therefore, it should have his support in the event of the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) being negatived.

MR. ROBERT PALMER said, that, as the author of the words in the Bill, he had no objection that they should be omitted in favour of those proposed by the right hon. Baronet.

The House divided:—Ayes 86; Noes 126; Majority 40.

On the Question that the Bill do pass, MR. ROBERT PALMER said, that, as he had been unable, from the rules of the House, to move a clause limiting the operation of the Bill to one or two years, although he thought it extremely desirable that it should only be a temporary measure, he should wish to know whether the noble Lord would agree to make some arrangement for the introduction of a clause for that purpose?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he had previously stated, that he had no very great objection to the hon. Gentleman's proposition, but, of course, he could not pledge himself as to what shape the Bill might take after it had been disposed of by that House.

MR. HENLEY said, he should now move an Amendment that the Bill do pass on that day three months.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he wished to observe, before strangers were ordered to withdraw, that, although the declaration had been left out of the Bill by a Vote of that House, yet he considered it was of very great importance in the first place, that they should consolidate into one Act the various laws relating to bribery and treating; and in the next place, not assuming any credit or merit to himself or the Government for what had been done, that they should make the experiment of an election auditor in the manner proposed by this Bill. He did believe that more would be done to restrain the expenses of elections by the appointment of such an officer than by anything that had ever been done before, and therefore he should be extremely sorry to see the Bill lost, and should certainly oppose the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment.

MR. CRAUFURD said, that, although he had supported the Bill in its first stages, and, although he concurred with the noble Lord as to the effect of the appointment of an election officer, as he believed the Bill in its present shape would open the door to endless means of bribery, he could not now vote in its favour.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Bill do pass."

The House divided:—Ayes 107; Noes 100; Majority 7.

Bill passed.

Bill read 1st.

LORD REDESDALE said, that their Lordships had read this Bill a first time out of courtesy to the other House of Parliament; but he thought he should not be trespassing improperly on their Lordships' time in asking the Government what course they proposed to take with respect to it. It would be in the recollection of the House that a Resolution, of which notice was given in February last, was agreed to by their Lordships in May, with reference to the time after which they would not, unless in excepted cases, read any Bill a second time; and it was now for them to consider what course they should take with respect to this Bill, having regard both to this Resolution and to the subject of the measure itself. He was glad, indeed, that he could refer to this Resolution in conjunction with the present Bill, inasmuch as it was not at all of a party character. He must thank the Government for the manner in which they had met the Resolution to which he had referred. They had treated it as one seriously adopted by the House after due notice, and up to the present time no attempt had been made to infringe it. The countenance which the Government had given to the Resolution had, in fact, had considerable effect upon the attendance of Peers; for every one believed that the Resolution was to be carried out, and therefore naturally expected that no Bills of importance, except such as were on the table of their Lordships' House before the 25th of last month, would be proceeded with. There could be no doubt that this Bill was not one of those which the Resolution in question excepted from its operation; and, although, undoubtedly, the subject was one of great importance, he thought it was one as to which the Resolution ought to take effect. The object of that Resolution was not only that their Lordships should have time to discuss measures of importance, and that there might be an adequate attendance of Peers for their consideration, but also, out of regard to the privileges of the other House, that they might have time to entertain the Amendments made by the House of Lords in Bills emanating from them. He believed, in fact, that the independence of both Houses of Parliament as legislative bodies would be materially advanced if that Resolution were properly and fairly carried out, and that more respect would be entertained for their measures if they did not pass Acts to which they were utterly unable to give a fair consideration. He had received from Earl Grey, who was unable to be present, a letter expressing his hope that the House would adhere to their Resolution with respect to this measure, and refuse to consider it in a hurry. His noble Friend added that he thought the Bill altogether a bad one, and would have opposed it if in town; and even those who approved of it must admit that it involved new and startling propositions, and required more consideration than it could receive in the month of August. With respect to this particular Bill, before it had been sent up to their Lordships' House, it had been committed and recommitted again by the other House, and had been, after all, so materially altered on the third reading, that he believed many Members who had taken part in the discussions upon it hardly knew what were the contents of the Bill as it quitted the House of Commons. And so little confidence had that House in the Bill even in its most improved state, that they only passed it after all by a majority of seven. He would, then, ask their Lordships whether they were now to proceed to consider a Bill which was not yet even printed? [Lord LYNDHURST remarked that it had been three weeks before the other House.] Many weeks. It was impossible to touch a Bill of this character without making Amendments of the most important character; and then they might have to send it down again to the other House, perhaps on the last day of the Session, to be hastily considered by the few Members who remained in town. He did not think that that was the way in which a subject of this importance should be dealt with, and he did, therefore, entreat their Lordships to adhere to their Resolution, which had already had an important effect in the present Session, although he regretted that the attention of the Government had only been recently called to it. In future Sessions of Parliament there could be no doubt that it would tend very materially to enforce the early preparation of business for both Houses; and he therefore hoped they would not break through a Resolution which had worked well hitherto, and was likely to work still more satisfactorily hereafter. He did not wish it to be supposed that he considered the present law in relation to bribery at all satisfactory; but he must at the same time add that the present Bill was open to many grave objections. He was satisfied, therefore, that they could adhere to their Resolution without at all violating the courtesy which was due to the other House, because if they entertained this Bill they must make numerous alterations in it, and by refusing to consider it they were therefore only saying that they would not send Amendments down to the other House at so late a period of the Session that it would be impossible to do justice to their consideration. He was satisfied that, by adhering to their Resolution, which they had passed deliberately at an early period of the Session, they would do that which was most likely to facilitate the transaction of business in future years, and to ensure the due consideration of measures in both Houses of Parliament.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE could not deny what had fallen from the noble Lord with respect to the extreme inconvenience arising in the House from Bills of such an important character coming up so late; but, at the same time, the noble Lord would admit this was no new grievance, having been frequently the subject of complaint. He was extremely glad that the Resolution passed by his noble Friend would be tested with reference to the present Bill, because, as the noble Lord had said, it was not a party measure, and ought not, and he hoped would not, entail any party feelings or struggles in that House. His noble Friend thought the Resolution would be productive of great advantage in future Sessions, and considered it of much importance that their Lordships should insist on its literal fulfilment in the present instance. He (the Duke of Newcastle) must differ from his noble Friend as to the policy, on the first introduction of a measure of that kind, of making it so exceedingly stringent with reference to a particular case, when the other House was not entirely cognisant of the exact nature of their Lordships' Resolution; for his noble Friend admitted that the attention of the Members of the Government in the other House had only been called to it a short time ago. His noble Friend could not have considered what the Resolution was. It did not say that in no instance was a Bill to be read a second time which should come up to their Lordships' House after the 25th of July; but there were to be special exemptions of Bills of Supply and measures of urgency. The noble Lord could hardly deny that there were circumstances of special urgency in this measure. Their Lordships must be aware that, early in the present Session, the House of Commons had come to a Resolution, that the writs of five boroughs should not be issued, until some legislative measure had passed of a character likely to prevent the system of bribery which had prevailed in those boroughs theretofore. It was specially with reference to the present Bill that the House of Commons had passed that Resolution, and the House of Commons had awaited the issue of this measure before consenting to issue the writs for these boroughs. He thought that their Lordships would admit that the issue of these writs ought not to be suspended longer than was necessary, and the measure therefore came before their Lordships as a special case of urgency. He hoped, when their Lordships came to a decision upon this question, they would agree that, although it was desirable to uphold their Lordships' Resolution, yet that, as regarded the particular measure now before them, their Lordships were called upon, as well from a sense of what was due to the other House, as from the constitutional doctrine that these boroughs should not be unrepresented longer than was necessary, not to insist upon applying their Resolution in this particular case, and to give this Bill a second reading. The noble Lord had himself borne evidence to the fact that the Government had met this Resolution in a proper spirit. Bills had been introduced first into their Lordships' House as far as possible, in order not to infringe the Resolution, and there had been every desire on the part of the Government to uphold it to the best of their power, so that measures of importance should not be protracted until so late a period of the Session. He, therefore, hoped that their Lordships would not insist upon applying the Standing Order to the Bill now before them.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, the noble Duke was right in saying that this was no new grievance, and that Session after Session complaints were made of the late period of the Session at which Bills came up to their Lordships from the other House. Therefore it was that their Lordships had determined to take steps to prevent the recurrence of this evil. His noble Friend (Lord Redesdale) had, so early as the 28th of February in the present Session, given notice of his intention to move the Resolution, which on the 2nd of May received their Lordships' assent. Ample notice had therefore been given; and he must suggest to the Government, that if they intended to interfere with the Resolution on the first occasion when it became applicable, it would have been better not to pass it at all. They had placed upon their journals a Resolution which was intended to guide the proceedings of the other House of Parliament, which had become matter of public notoriety, and to which the attention of the Government had been specially called; and if, when a Bill of small importance came before their Lordships, it was said, "Oh, let this Bill pass; it is a Bill of such trivial importance that you will not think of adhering to your Standing Order;" and when a Bill of grave importance came up from the other House their Lordships were told, "You cannot think of applying the Resolution to this case, because the Bill is of such urgency and importance that it is absolutely necessary to suspend the Resolution," the Resolution would become practically a dead letter. There were several Bills that had been read a second time since the 25th.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE: Only one, and that was upon the Motion of my noble Friend himself.

THE EARL OF DERBY: Of course, in the case of mere continuing Bills and Bills making no material changes he did not wish to strain the Resolution of his noble Friend (Lord Redesdale), but he thought it would be wise to adhere to the spirit of the Resolution, in order that their Lordships and the other House of Parliament should not send forth legislative measures which were discreditable to themselves, and which could not practically work well for the country; and that their Lordships should have full time to consider any Bill, and the other House of Parliament full time to consider any Amendments which might be adopted by their Lordships, and sent down to the other House for their adoption. The noble Duke said, that the Resolution excepted measures of urgency. Now, the words of the Resolution were—

"That this House will not read any Bill a second time after Tuesday the 26th of July, except Bills of Aid or Supply, or any Bill in relation to which the House shall have resolved, before the second reading is moved, that the circumstances which render legislation on the subject-matter of the same expedient are either of such recent occurrence or urgency as to render the immediate consideration of the said Bill necessary."

Now, the events that had led to the intro-

duction of this Bill could not certainly be said to be of recent occurrence or urgency. The Resolution agreed to by their Lordships was intended to provide for cases of unforeseen urgency; but had the House of Commons determined that it was absolutely necessary to legislate on this subject? The present Bill, after having been altered more than half a dozen times in the other House, in its progress through its various stages, had, after being read a third time, had one of its most material provisions—the declaration—expunged from it, on the strength of which it had received the support of many hon. Members. Then came a division upon the question that the Bill from which the declaration had thus been expunged should pass, and whatever the House of Commons might have thought of the original Bill, in a House of 200 Members the Motion that the Bill do pass was only adopted by a majority of seven. Now, was that a case in which the House of Commons could be said to have so strong an opinion of the necessity of passing the present Bill, that, out of courtesy to that House, their Lordships ought to violate a Resolution passed to remedy an evil of long standing? He denied that the Bill was a case of urgency. If their Lordships now set aside their Resolution, it would become in future a piece of waste paper; they would break faith not only with the Members of that and the other House of Parliament, but also with the public, who had a right to expect, from the adoption of the Resolution, that no hasty or ill-considered legislation would take place at this late period of the Session. The reasonableness of this Resolution had been acknowledged by the leaders of the Government in the other House, and it had exercised a practical influence upon the legislation of the other House. Some Bills had been dropped, and others accelerated, to meet the Resolution of their Lordships. But if the House of Commons saw that on the first occasion when this Resolution came into practical effect their Lordships abstained from adhering to it, and that Bill after Bill passed a second reading after the 25th of July, the House of Commons would say that such a Resolution stood indeed upon their Lordships' Journals, but that their Lordships did not mean to adhere to it—that they never intended to act upon it—and that it would be quite idle to take any trouble to send up Bills at an early period of the Session for their Lordships' consideration. This was a case which strongly confirmed him in the opinion he had before expressed, that it was desirable for each House to take into their consideration at the commencement of next Session, Bills which had passed through all the other stages in the other House. To that plan he felt convinced Parliament must come at last. Here was a Bill of great importance and of the deepest interest, in the object of which their Lordships and the other House alike concurred, and yet it was sent to them at a period of the Session when their only alternative was either to reject it altogether, or to pass it in a most imperfect state. But if their Lordships had the power of postponing it, either to the month of February or to November, if Parliament were to meet in that month, then their Lordships would be able to reconcile their duty to the public and their desire to unite with the House of Commons in considering some practical remedy. They might then make a satisfactory measure out of the present Bill, but if they passed it in its present state it would be satisfactory to none, or, at all events, to a very small majority, and their Lordships would send down a Bill to the other House which would be no credit either to themselves or to the other House of Parliament.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN said, the true question for the House to consider was, whether this Bill did not come under the exception contained in the Resolution. Looking fairly to this subject, he thought that there never was a Bill which more manifestly came under the excepted provisions. The noble Earl who had just sat down had found it convenient to describe this Resolution incorrectly. [The Earl of Derby: I read it.] But the noble Earl interpreted it inaccurately with a view to show that the present Bill did not come under the exceptions of the Resolution, because he said that this is not a measure of urgency. Now, he should like to know whether the noble Earl was prepared to say that the indefinite postponement of the representation of five boroughs was a matter of indifference, and was not to be regarded as a serious matter of urgency?

THE EARL OF DERBY had said, that the subject-matter of the Bill was not of such recent occurrence and urgency as was contemplated by the Resolution.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN begged to say that it was because the House of Commons had come to the resolution that the writs for these boroughs should not be issued until a remedy had been provided against a repetition of the offences against which this Bill was directed. He said, therefore, that it was a measure the subject-matter of which was of recent occurrence and urgency, and that it was an instance in which most properly the Resolution may be relaxed. If the noble Baron who proposed this Resolution had thought of proposing it without such exceptions as he introduced, he was sure he would have had no chance of carrying it. The only inducement he for one had to agree to the Resolution was, the prospect of a liberal construction being put upon it when a case arose to require such an interpretation. They would otherwise never have thought of imposing such an arbitrary condition upon the proceedings of the other House as would have been quite intolerable, and to which that House would never have acceded. The fact was that the Resolution had already, by the admission of the noble Earl himself, produced those good effects which the noble Baron anticipated from it, and this was exactly how he (the Earl of Aberdeen) had expected it would operate—that tacitly, and without the necessity for interfering in the main, they would accomplish what they were attempting to do. But that their Lordships should be deprived of the means of relaxing that Resolution in such cases as the present was perfectly unreasonable; and, had it not been for the prospect of such a power being given, he for one would never have agreed to the Resolution when proposed by the noble Baron.

THE EARL OF DERBY thought the noble Duke and the noble Earl would find themselves mistaken as to the effect of that Resolution of the House of Commons; he believed the Resolution of the House of Commons was not that the new writs should not be issued until new legislation had taken place, but that the new writs should not be issued except upon notice of eight days being given; but there certainly was an announcement that an Act would be passed to regulate elections. There was, he believed, a Motion coming on that night in the other House, that new writs should be issued for these boroughs, notwithstanding this Bill had not yet passed.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE observed, that the Resolution might not have been exactly in the words stated by his noble Friend (the Earl of Aberdeen), but his noble Friend had stated the object of the Resolution. He (the Duke of Newcastle) begged to give notice that on Thursday, instead of moving the second reading of the Bill, he would move with reference to it a Resolution similar in terms to the exceptions in the Resolution proposed by his noble Friend (Lord Redesdale) in order that the Bill might then be read a second time.

LORD BROUGHAM thought it was not necessary that any Resolution should be moved. The noble Duke might move the Bill subject to the objection that it was against the Standing Order, and he might say it was not against the Standing Order, but in accordance with the exception to the Standing Order. No unnecessary delay should take place in bringing on the second reading. It was most highly expedient that the Bill, if it were to be proceeded with in its present shape in that House, should be proceeded with as speedily as possible, and before any greater number of their Lordships had left town than had already left it. He was rejoiced to hear that the measure would not be put off until next week, which would increase the evil of discussing so important a measure when there was comparatively so small an attendance.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE considered that if it were deemed necessary to suspend the Resolution in this case, the sooner the House came to a decision upon the point the better. If the Order should be suspended, there should then be a very long delay before they took any further steps upon the Bill. When they made up their minds whether they should decide upon the Bill, they should then have some days carefully to read the Bill and look it over.

LORD REDESDALE said, that under the Resolution their Lordships had adopted the circumstances that were to render legislation expedient were either matters of recent occurrence or unforeseen urgency. Now, he submitted that, after what had been said, it was by no means clear that the House of Commons itself thought immediate legislation necessary; but to contend that so old a question as bribery was of recent occurrence or urgency, was really one of the most extraordinary means of getting rid of a Resolution of their Lordships that he had ever heard of. To rescind the Resolution in the present case would, he thought, go far to contravene whatever advantage might be expected to result from the adoption of that Resolution. The effect of the proceeding which was now proposed to be adopted would be, that whoever could command a majority of the House at the time could determine what Bill was a Bill that had reference to a recent occurrence, and was urgent in its nature. The rule would, therefore, do nothing at all, and there would be no protection for legislation, and he hoped the noble Earl opposite would consider the matter before Thursday; because the effect of rescinding the Resolution and considering the Bill might be, that their Lordships might make important alterations, or perhaps replace some of the provisions which the House of Commons objected to; and to send it back to the House of Commons when there would not be a large attendance of Members, would not be treating that House fairly on a question so nearly affecting its privileges. In fact, he did not think they would be paying the House of Commons a compliment by passing such a Bill at this time.

INCUMBERED ESTATES COURT (IRELAND)—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE rose to ask the intentions of Her Majesty's Government as to the renewal of the Act under which the Incumbered Estates Court in Ireland was established. The noble Marquess argued that it was advisable that the present anomalous state of the law with regard to property in Ireland should not continue, but that there should be one permanent law applicable to all landed estates, and by means of which the same facilities, which he admitted had worked advantageously, for the sale of real property should be given as was afforded temporarily by the Incumbered Estates Act, while at the same time such extensive and summary powers were not vested in the Court. He begged to know whether the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack could tell him what course the Government intended to pursue, and whether he would give any promise that early next Session any plan would be brought forward for the improvement of the law of the country generally, which would enable them to do away with the Incumbered Estates Court, and improve generally the existing state of the equity courts.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, their Lordships were aware that by the law as it now exists under the Act of last Session, the Incumbered Estates Court had one year to endure, the Act providing that they should continue till July, 1855, and that after that a further period should be allowed for winding up any suits that were pending. His noble Friend asked what were the intentions of the Government with regard to continuing that Court, or whether it was intended to unite it with the Court of Chancery, or to make any other modification in the Court as it now existed. He would not complain at such a question being asked, but he wished to explain to his noble Friend why he was unable to give him a distinct answer now. Last Session the Government had introduced into this House a Bill for facilitating the transfer of land by means of a system of registration, but which, when it went to the other House, was not sanctioned by that House, but was referred to a Select Committee. That Committee reported that the plan was not entitled to favour, but that a Commission should issue to inquire into the best plan for facilitating the transfer of land, and by which such transfer, although not so readily effected as the sale of a horse or a watch, should be made comparatively easy. He felt it his duty to issue such a Commission, which was directed to gentlemen connected not only with this country, but to gentlemen connected with Ireland. He had recently been in communication with the Commissioners, and one of them had informed him that they had held constant meetings, and they were satisfied that they had before them one or two plans which would be a great improvement on the present law, and greatly facilitate the transfer of land. He would not give any opinion as to whether the Commissioners would be able to arrive at the result they hoped for; but he should be ready to consider any plan which would render the question of the continuance of the Incumbered Estates Court unimportant, and by which the exceptional legislation in relation to that Court would be removed. But unless some such plan was brought forward, the Government did not think it would be advisable to remove the Incumbered Estates Court, for the advantages which continued to be derived from that Court appeared to be very great indeed. Since last year (as it appeared from returns made by the Commissioners), that is, from the 1st of August to the 9th of June in the present year, there had been 400 new applications to the Court, which, practically speaking, was the same amount of applications as had taken place in the previous two years. At the same time the Commissioners, with great caution and propriety, stated that, although the number of applications was as great, the amount of property dealt with was less, as the applications related to smaller estates. When, therefore, the Government saw that the number of applications to the Court continued so great, unless some other satisfactory plan was found in relation to this subject, they thought they would not be warranted in depriving that country of the advantages which had been derived from the existence of the Court.

THE EARL OF GLENGALL declared that the most disgraceful transactions that ever had been known since courts had been invented had taken place in that Court. In many instances there had been in it the greatest jobbery that it was possible to imagine. There was a set of professional schemers in Dublin, who, by their myrmidons and agents, sent through the country to all the attorneys in the land to get cases into the Court; and the result was, that there was a system of plunder going on that was perfectly unexampled. At least one-fourth of the cases that had been brought into that Court had been brought into it by means of one firm in Dublin and their associates—their brother schemers. He should like to know exactly what amount of the property purchased in that Court had been purchased by money which had been raised by mortgage on it by the parties who purchased it. It could be proved by a vast number of highly respectable men that hundreds upon hundreds of thousands of the money had been raised by mortgage on the property purchased, and the property having now risen in value to the extent of some eight or nine years' purchase, the parties were making a very considerable profit by it. The property of some of his friends had been sold for nine or ten years' purchase, and it was now worth twenty-five years' purchase, the property having been sold when the country was ground down by famine and disease. The estates were incumbered by those purchasers as much as they ever had been before, and they were selling those properties again. One man made a regular trade of it—an attorney in the West of Ireland made a regular trade of it. Two of the Commissioners of the Court were Irish, and four or five barristers, their relatives, had the practice of the Court, which was so very far away from the law courts that the barristers practising in the regular courts could not go up there.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, that the first part of the reply of his noble and learned Friend was satisfactory, but the latter part was not equally satisfactory. He again urged the necessity of doing away with the anomaly of two existing codes of law in reference to landed property in Ireland. If the law was so good as it was represented to be, it ought to be extended to this country as well as to Ireland.

PAROCHIAL SCHOOLMASTERS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

House in Committee (according to Order).

LORD KINNAIRD said, he could not allow the Bill to pass without expressing his regret that it was but a temporary measure. He hoped the Government would prepare a measure which would place the schoolmasters' salaries at an amount which would be equal to their deserts.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that this being only a temporary Bill, intended for one year only, implied on the part of the Government an opinion that during the next Session it would be their duty to renew the endeavour they had made to provide for a more permanent system of national education in Scotland. But whether the future measure of the Government would be such a Bill as the one which the noble Lord (Lord Kinnaird) had just laid on the table (a Bill to amend the Law relating to Parish Schools in Scotland), it was not for him now to speculate or to state. He must, however, observe, that the measure which the Government had introduced this Session on the subject, but which unfortunately did not meet with success, did not convey a censure upon the parochial system of education in Scotland, which he (the Duke of Argyll) believed had proved of the greatest benefit to that country. The parochial schools were certainly sectarian in the sense of being denominational schools; but it was entirely untrue that they were sectarian schools in the sense of interference with the religious opinions of the people. The salaries of the schoolmasters were now paid by the landed property of the parishes, and he thought that it was a matter deserving of consideration, how far trading and commercial incomes ought to contribute a share towards the support of the system; in which case, of course, all who contributed would be fairly entitled to a certain voice in the management. He maintained that the Bill which was brought forward by the Government for improving the existing system of national education in Scotland, but which was unfortunately lost in the present Session, was a measure founded in the main upon the ancient law and practice of Scotland, and deviating from them only in those points where the altered circumstances of the country absolutely required it.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH hoped that they should never see a system adopted in Scotland by which the public schoolmaster would be elected by the ratepayers—a system which he believed would be a curse instead of a blessing to the country. He was extremely glad that the noble Lord (Lord Kinnaird) had prepared a Bill on this subject with great care, and laid it on their Lordships' table. He had been favoured by the kindness of the noble Lord with a previous opportunity of seeing the draft of the measure, and he believed it was one that would be more acceptable to the people of Scotland than the measure which the Government had introduced without success.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said a few words in explanation.

Bill reported without Amendment; an Amendment made; and Bill to be read 3^d To-morrow.

REAL ESTATE CHARGES BILL.

Order of the day for the House to be put into a Committee read.

Moved, That the House be now put into a Committee on the said Bill.

LORD ST. LEONARDS said, that he wished to call their Lordships' attention to the provisions of this important Bill, and to the manner in which they would affect real estate. There were two ways in which this measure could be viewed—first, with regard to the ulterior changes affecting real property to which it would prepare the way; and next, the actual provisions it contained with respect to real property. As their Lordships might be aware, another Bill, at an earlier period of the present Session, had been introduced into the other House of Parliament, having for its object to prevent primogeniture from taking effect in regard to the descent of real estate where the owner died intestate; but that measure was rejected. The present Bill was now brought forward as a measure to provide some relief for personal estate as against real estate, and to a certain extent it would give to the next of kin the real estate, which, as the law now stood, belonged to the heir at law. If the question were simply whether or not the law of England should be altered so as to get rid of the principle of primogeniture, and to allow real estate to be divided amongst all the children in the same way as personalty, as some persons in this country desired, it was a matter of which he thought their Lordships would very easily dispose. He did not say that there might not be much argument upon the subject; but, looking at the effect in France of the system in operation there of minutely subdividing landed property, and seeing how this country flourished under the law as it now existed, nothing could be more unwise than to introduce the change which was proposed by the Bill to which he had alluded as having been lost in the other House. Now, the present Bill was an endeavour to obtain an instalment of that former measure, an endeavour to introduce a principle, the establishment of which, step by step, might have the indirect effect of accomplishing an end which, if pursued by a more direct proceeding, by Bill in either House of Parliament, would not be successful. He admitted that, if this Bill were right and proper in itself, and capable of being carried into execution, then, although some of its advocates had further and dangerous views, that would be no reason for refusing to pass the measure, and that the time for objecting to a further measure would be when that further measure came to be proposed; yet their Lordships must be on their guard against sanctioning a principle which they wished to deny, and which could only weaken the foundation of the whole existing law regarding real property, and might be used to hamper their discretion in their subsequent deliberations. Under the law as it now stood, if a man had an estate which descended to him from an ancestor, and which was charged with a mortgage, with portions, or any other incumbrance, or if he bought an estate subject to any mortgage or incumbrance, these incumbrances did not become a charge upon his personal estate; and even if he were to do an act which would bind him personally in regard to certain incumbrances upon the estate he inherited or had bought, the law would not make that incumbrance a debt upon his personal estate, unless he showed an intention to make it his personal debt; it would be a burden upon the real estate upon which it was charged, and the personal estate of the owner would not be liable to pay the debt. But if a man borrow money, although he secure it on his real estate, it is his debt, and like all other his debts, is payable out of his personal estate as the first fund. Now it had been urged that cases of great hardship occasionally arose from this provision of the law, where no provision was made by will or otherwise to meet such incumbrances, and an instance had been quoted of a person having mortgaged his estate and dying without a will or making any provision for the discharge of such mortgage, the personalty became liable to the liquidation of the incumbrance upon the realty, of which the heir at law had the benefit, to the prejudice of the other children. But this difficulty would not have occurred if the father had taken the precaution to provide against it by will or otherwise, as he might have done. Consequently, the law as it stood provided the remedy. The principle of the law, for the last two centuries, was, that the burden of the incumbrance should be borne by that class of property for the benefit of which it was incurred. If the burden were incurred for the purpose of improving the personal estate, it was but just that the personalty should bear it. The principle of the law was clear, and it was open to every man to make a provision to prevent the operation of that law inflicting hardship upon those for whom it was his duty to provide. It was not for Parliament to legislate for every case of hardship consequent upon a man's neglecting to take the ordinary precautions by will against the exigencies of his own family. It was no doubt true that many cases of hardship arose under the present law; but he could point out others equally hard on heirs at law, against which no provision is proposed to be made. For instance, a man having an estate worth 100,000*l.*, which he intended to descend to his heir finds that there was another estate that he could buy with much greater advantage if he could sell his own. An opportunity for selling might offer, and having actually sold, he might die before the purchase-money could be reinvested; and in that case the heir at law would be deprived of both the estate and the purchase-money. Well, how could they deal by legislation with such a case? It was a man's duty to make a will meeting the exigencies of his own position; and if they were to legislate for cases of hardship arising from the neglect of this duty, thousands of cases might start up, and it would be impossible to provide effectually for them by Act of Parliament. He (Lord St. Leonards) would put a still harder case. A man contracted to sell his real estate, and died before the contract was executed. As that estate descended to his eldest son, one would think that he would not be badly off, because he would be entitled to the purchase-money. But not a bit of it. Every shilling of it went to the personal estate, and the heir-at-law did not receive a sixpence more than the other children. Nothing could be more illogical than to lay down general provisions upon single cases, and it was perfectly impossible to provide by legislation for all cases that might arise. It was impossible to frame the law with reference to particular instances; and if important changes were to be made in the perfunctory and careless manner proposed by this Bill, there would be no end to the mischief that would ensue. If they were to attempt to remodel the law of England, and look to the hardships that were likely to arise on the one side and on the other, he thought it ought not to have been left in the hands of a private Member, but should at least be taken up by the responsible head of the law, and a comprehensive measure, carefully matured and well digested, should be introduced, that the country might clearly understand their intentions with regard to the law of property which had existed for centuries. Now, this Bill proposed that personal estate should not be the first fund from which to pay the debts of the deceased secured upon his real property; but that the real estate should be the first fund—that was, that the next of kin should be relieved at the expense of the heir at law. But if right it did not go far enough. If an estate were devised subject to an incumbrance created by the deviser, and an estate descended from the deviser to his heir at law, the descended estate would be the first fund to pay the debt on the estate of the devisee; so that if a man gave an estate, with a mortgage of 500*l.* created by him upon it to one son, and left another estate to descend to the eldest son, the eldest son would be liable to pay the mortgage upon his younger brother's estate, and yet no provision is inserted to meet that case. He now came to the second clause of the Bill. Upon this clause he believed the other House divided at a very inconvenient hour of the morning—three o'clock he was informed

Lord St. Leonards.

—and it was carried but by a small majority, almost without discussion, and without consideration. This clause was a most important, and, he was justified in saying also, a most improper one. It provided that—

“ From and after the passing of this Act, when any person shall die seized of or entitled to any land for an estate of inheritance, and shall have by his will directed the same to be sold for the payment of his debts or the purposes of his will, then, unless such person shall by his will have signified any contrary or other intention, the land so devised shall be deemed by a court of equity to be converted into personal estate, and the whole, or any portion thereof that may not be required for the purposes mentioned in the will, shall be divided under the Statute for the distribution of the estates of intestates.”

The rule of law was, that if a man provided by will that his real estate should be sold and be converted out-and-out, as it was called, then the proceeds of the real estate become personalty; and why?—because it was so directed by the testator. And, on the other hand, if it were directed to sell the real estate to meet certain demands, and for certain purposes only, and those demands and purposes might be satisfied without selling the whole estate, the portion not required to be sold would belong to the heir at law. But this law would in every case convert the whole of the estate into personalty, and the surplus over what was necessary to satisfy the purposes of the will is to be divided under the Statute for the distribution of intestate estates. It did not enact that the whole estate should be sold and the money divided amongst the next of kin, but that any portion not required for the purposes mentioned in the will should be divided under the Statute for the distribution of the estates of intestates, so that they would thus be giving to the next of kin that which belonged to the heir at law, and, moreover dividing the real estate itself amongst the next of kin. He considered both clauses most objectionable. Moreover, he never before saw a Bill interfering with men's properties which did not save existing wills, or allow some time to enable persons to guard against the operation of the new law. Holding that the principle involved was a dangerous innovation of the law of real property, he moved as an Amendment that the House go into Committee upon the Bill on that day three months.

Amendment moved, to leave out “now,” for the purpose of inserting “this day three months.”

EARL FORTESCUE said, that he could assure their Lordships that were it not that he entertained the strongest conviction of the justice of this measure, and that it would afford a safe remedy for a great practical oppression, he would not have presumed to press upon the consideration of the House any opinion of his against the high authority of the noble and learned Lord. He thought, however, that the noble and learned Lord could not have felt so strongly as he said the justice of his own case, when he went back upon the history of the Bill, accusing its advocates of ulterior objects, and treated the Bill as an instalment of a larger measure for the abolition of the law of primogeniture. He hoped it was unnecessary for him to meet that part of the noble and learned Lord's argument; but, so far from the Bill being directed against the law of primogeniture, he (Earl Fortescue) believed that the adoption of it would tend to render that law more popular than it was at present, by depriving its operation of much hardship and injustice. The noble and learned Lord had suggested instances of hardship that might be experienced under this Bill; but he had, in moving the second reading, pointed to two out of many grievous hardships that had actually and recently occurred under the operation of the present law, a law which, be it recollected, was confined to England and Ireland, for Scotland was happily exempt from it. He had mentioned a case of a man who, having bought an estate for 1,400*l.*, left half that sum on a mortgage upon it, and dying suddenly and intestate, the whole of his personal property was taken by his eldest son, and absorbed in paying off the remaining 700*l.*, and his six younger children were in consequence left in beggary and destitution. He had mentioned another case in which a parent left the whole of his personal property to his only daughter, and his real estate, heavily mortgaged, to a distant relation. There was no doubt that his object was that the bequest to his daughter should be wholly unincumbered; but the devise of the real estate came upon the personal property to pay the incumbrance on the land, and the result was, that the lady's estate was reduced many thousands below what her father had intended or anticipated. He would now mention a third case. A clergyman with good church preferment had ensured his life to a large amount, and from time to time bought land, leaving the chief part of the purchase-money on mortgage upon it. Being taken dangerously ill a few years ago, he made a will, leaving all his property to his wife, to be by her distributed between his two sons. He recovered his health, but lost his reason. His wife was now dying, and in the probable event of his surviving her, the eldest son would take the whole property, and the younger would be wholly unprovided for. He had heard nothing from the noble and learned Lord to alter his opinion of the hardship of the existing law, or to convince him that injury would be done by the proposed alteration. He should propose that the Act should come into operation from the 31st December, 1854, instead of from the passing of the Act.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that though this Bill had not been introduced under the sanction of the Government, he took upon himself the entire responsibility of saying that he believed the first clause of the Bill would be productive of unmixed good. Of the second he had not so favourable an opinion. The Bill itself would not in the slightest degree trench upon or approach the question of primogeniture. It was simply a Bill which would in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred make the disposition of property conformable with the real intentions of the owner. He agreed with his noble and learned Friend (Lord St. Leonards) that it was impossible so to legislate that no cases of hardship should exist. What we ought to attempt was, to make our enactments of such a nature that in the majority of cases in which persons gave no directions as to the disposal of their property it should go according to their wishes. He put it to their Lordships whether they did not, any of them, suppose that if they left land which was mortgaged, and also personal property, their eldest son would take the land subject to the mortgage, while the personal property would be divided equally among all their children? Such, however, was not the law. The law said that the mortgaged estate must be relieved at the expense of the personal property, and thus the younger children of a family be made to pay a mortgage on the estate of their elder brother. He believed that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred in which this took place, it was contrary to the intention of the person from whom the property had descended. The object of the first clause of this Bill was to remedy this evil, and to make the law conformable to what was the general understanding of ninety-nine out of every hundred persons owning property. He was aware that two or three alterations would be required in the clause, but he could not see how the most strenuous advocates of primogeniture could see any danger in a clause which had no reference whatever to that subject, except so far as under that law the intentions of persons as to the disposal of their property were often defeated. He regretted that this question of primogeniture should be drawn into matters with which it was not at all connected, and thus an odium should be cast upon the advocates of the Bill which they ought not to incur. He should propose, if no other noble Lord did, that the second clause should be omitted, for he did not see his way so clearly with this clause, or that it would tend to the disposition of property as parties intended. He thought that the course for his noble Friend to follow would be to consent to certain Amendments in the first clause, rendered necessary by the incautious manner in which the Bill had been framed; and, as the object of the measure was to make the law conform with the intentions of people as to the disposition of their property, he trusted their Lordships would not object to go into Committee upon it.

On Question that "now" stand part of the Motion, their Lordships divided:—Content 26; Not Content 23: Majority 3.

Resolved in the affirmative. House in Committee accordingly.

Clause 1 agreed to with Amendments, fixing the date at which the Act should come into operation at the 31st December, 1854, and extending the provisions of the clause, not to personal property only, but also to real property other than that which was the subject of the mortgage.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in answer to a question from Lord St. Leonards, said, little good would be done by excepting in the present Bill wills already made; in fact, the Bill would operate less in the case of wills than in cases of intestacy. A period of six months was to be allowed before the Act came into force, to enable parties to consider whether alterations in their wills were necessary, but he would, before the bringing up of the report, consider whether a longer period than six months should be allowed for this.

EARL FORTESCUE said, that after what had been stated by his noble and learned Friend, he would not press the second clause.

The Lord Chancellor

Clause struck out.

DRAINAGE OF LANDS BILL.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee read.

Moved, That the House be now put into Committee on the said Bill.

LORD PORTMAN hoped that their Lordships would not consent to proceed, at this period of the Session with this Bill, which contained sixty clauses, affecting all the real property in the kingdom. He could venture to say, from the attention he had given to the subject, that no such Bill as the present had ever passed through their Lordships' House; for it not only interfered with all the property specified in the Bill, but with a great quantity which no one would suspect was touched at all, unless, in reading the various clauses of the Bill they bore in mind the construction that the interpretation clause put on various words. He considered that the powers given to the Commissioners were too large, for under this Act they were empowered to sell any portion of anybody's land not exceeding three acres, to anybody whom they might think fit to authorise to buy it. This, he thought, was rather strong, and it was made still more so when they remembered that the word "land" meant mills. Now, as mills seldom stood on so much as three acres, the consequence of this would be, that the Commissioners would be empowered to sell every mill in the kingdom, and the Commissioners themselves were to fix the amount of compensation to be given in such cases. They were also empowered to appoint an engineer, who, as soon as he was appointed, became an assistant Commissioner, invested with all the powers given under the Drainage Act. He thought that, under the present measure, too much licence was given, and he objected to it also, because it did away with the checks which they had under the old Drainage Act. The Commissioners had large powers to deal with property under 50*l.*, but, in the cases of those who were able to do good battle on their own account, the Bill made exemptions in their favour, as in the case of the Crown; there was also an exception in favour of all canal navigations, because the parties concerned in such works were powerful bodies; and his noble Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster had thought it necessary that that duchy should be exempted.

He (Lord Portman) thought that when their Lordships saw that the powerful had been protected, they would endeavour also equally to protect the small proprietors. Had this Bill been carefully watched by the law officers of the Crown, he believed it would never have passed the House of Commons; and, supported as the Bill had been by the Drainage Company—the vice chairman of which had the conduct of the Bill in the other House, though he (Lord Portman) believed that gentleman to be as pure as any Member of that House—still he could not help thinking that, under these circumstances, the Bill should be viewed with some suspicion. He trusted his noble Friend would consent not to proceed further with the present measure, but would next Session take up the subject and have a Committee carefully to consider whether they could not have a perfect drainage without committing the injustice with which the present Bill was fraught. The noble Lord, in conclusion, moved an Amendment, to leave out “now,” for the purpose of inserting “this day three months.”

EARL GRANVILLE said, that a few days ago, when considering the Resolution proposed by a noble Lord (Lord Redesdale) as to not taking the second reading of Bills after a certain day, they had had a debate upon the question of Bills coming up late to that House; but his noble Friend who had just sat down seemed to be pushing that Resolution to rather an extreme verge, when he endeavoured to induce their Lordships to refuse to consider a Bill, which he (Earl Granville) believed to be most unobjectionable in its character, and which had been most carefully discussed and considered in the other House, merely on account of the advanced period of the Session. His noble Friend, referring to the interpretation clause, said, that the Bill gave the Inclosure Commissioners the power of purchasing land and mills whenever they pleased. He could only say that the Commissioners had hitherto enjoyed precisely the same powers as were conferred by the present Bill, without any charge having been brought against them of having misappropriated those powers with regard to the purchase of mills. His noble Friend quite misapprehended the matter, because it was absurd to imagine that the Bill gave any arbitrary power to purchase mills. It was merely intended for the purpose of effecting an easement, where such might be necessary. His noble Friend also objected to what he termed the very objectionable power given to the Commissioners, of authorising any person they thought fit to purchase land wherever they pleased—as if these people were about to take possession of land for their own purpose! Why, the principle of the Bill was one which had been affirmed previously both by their Lordships and by the other House. It was, that there being at this moment a more urgent demand for drainage than at any former time, there should be the power vested in Commissioners for securing outfalls. The most useful works of this description were frequently stopped by the impossibility of obtaining outfalls, and he put it to their Lordships—who were always most anxious to preserve the rights of property—whether, when a great and useful object was to be attained, and proper conditions were placed upon the attainment of it, a proprietor was to be allowed, from a “dog-and-manger feeling,” and no other, to interfere with these operations, which might be of the greatest benefit to others, and ultimately even to himself, and even although he was to be amply compensated for any damage that might accrue to him? His noble Friend had objected also to the exemption clauses. So far as the clause for securing the rights of the Duchy of Lancaster was concerned, he assured his noble Friend that it was not at his suggestion, or that of his predecessor, that it had been inserted; it had been done by those who had drawn up the Bill merely as a matter of form, there being exemptions of exactly a similar nature in previous Bills. He certainly could not think that on account of the exemptions, therefore any case had been made for throwing out the Bill. He was not inclined to think any worse of the measure because it had been promoted in the House of Commons by a Gentleman who was connected with the Drainage of Land Company. That Gentleman was no political friend of his, but he said, without hesitation, that there was no single person in either House of Parliament, of whatever politics, in whom he would more entirely confide in any matter that required perfectly straightforward, honourable conduct, than Mr. Ker Seymour, who had introduced this Bill into the other House. He should be happy to consider any suggestions for improving the Bill in Committee, but he thought his noble Friend had shown no reason why this very useful measure should be postponed to another Session.

LORD REDESDALE said, he had come to the conclusion that the powers granted under the Bill were extravagant beyond measure, as interfering with the property of other persons besides those who might promote the undertaking. He felt he had no other alternative than to regard the Drainage Company as the actual promoters of the Bill, and he believed that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. K. Seymer), in consequence of his position relative to that Company, had been induced to try for this extension of powers. He felt quite certain that a Bill of this nature ought, previous to its becoming law, to be fully reviewed by a Select Committee of their Lordships; and he, therefore, trusted that the noble Earl would accede to the suggestion of his noble Friend opposite (Lord Portman), and not press it this Session.

On Question, that "now" stand part of the Motion, their Lordships divided:—Content 13; Not Content 23: Majority 10.

Resolved in the negative; and House to be put into Committee on this day Three Months.

Order for Second Reading read.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I rise, Sir, according to notice, to move the second reading of the Bill to continue for two years the Board of Public Health, and those Acts which confer their powers on the local and general boards of health. There cannot, I conceive, be any subject which is more interesting to Parliament, or which is more deserving of the attention of Parliament, than that which contemplates arrangements for the protection of the public health. When I say "the public health," I do not allude to the health of those wealthier classes of society who either have the means when casual sickness attacks them to have recourse to the best medical advice, or who, when they find themselves in a place where an epidemic has broken out, can fly to a healthier region, where, with all the appliances of art, and all the resources which opulence can place at their command, they can screen themselves from the danger which menaces them:—I speak of those humbler and poorer, but much more numerous members of the community, who by their calling are fixed to spots from which they cannot fly—who by their poverty are precluded from having recourse to the aids of art and science—who, from their want of information, are unable to protect themselves, by such means as may be at their disposal, from the noxious influences which surround them, and for the protection of whose health, therefore, it is most incumbent on the Legislature to make provision. We must remember that with such persons health is not, as with the upper classes of society, a mere question of pleasure, of enjoyment, or of comfort. Health to the lower classes is life—it is existence itself—it is the very breath they breathe. As long as they have health, so long they are able to labour, and to apply their industry to purposes useful to themselves and beneficial to others; but when sickness oppresses them, they are cast down into helpless poverty, and either they themselves, with their families, or their families if they should die, probably become burdens to that community of which they ought to be the mainstay and support. There is no part of the world more favoured by nature than this island in which it is our happiness to live. Men of science have explained to us how it happens—by what beautiful and merciful contrivance of Providence it has been so arranged—that these islands which, from their position in regard to the globe, might have been afflicted with the climate of Siberia or the Baltic, do in fact enjoy the most temperate climate in the world—how it happens that this country is free, on the one hand, from those burning heats which are so destructive to animal and vegetable life in other quarters of the globe, and exempt, upon the other, from those extremes of cold which in so many regions of the world make man, and beast, and vegetation alike torpid during the greater portion of the year. Our climate offers to us the means of enjoyment, the means of industry, the never-failing opportunity of accumulating wealth; and not only has it increased the opulence of the country, but, through the exertion of acquiring it, it has given to the people who reside in it habits of intellectual energy and physical strength, which enable them to rival the people of any part of the habitable globe. But although nature has done much, it cannot be said that man has seconded by his efforts the bounty of Providence. We are certainly liable to this reproach, that we have turned our attention too much to the production of wealth, and have forgotten that the very conditions of society which are most favourable to that object are also most favourable to the production of those influences which affect health, and by so doing counteract the production of wealth, and lead to the engendering of poverty. In order to the production of wealth, it is essential that men should be congregated in vast masses in towns. All the tendencies of our commercial and manufacturing habits have for years proceeded in that direction. Our towns have increased greatly in number, and prodigiously in extent, and our wealth has proportionally augmented. But men engaged in the active occupations of business, and in the acquisition of wealth, have not their attention sufficiently called to the influences incidental to the condition of the towns in which they live—influences which tend to undermine, or it may be destroy, the health of those masses on whose exertions they depend for the employment of their capital and the increase of their wealth. This matter forced itself on the attention of the Legislature some years ago; and in 1848, my noble Friend (the Earl of Carlisle) brought into Parliament a Bill—of which I now propose the continuance—in order to establish a General Board of Health, the object of which should be the diffusing of information, and the spreading of local organisation throughout the country for purposes of general health and comfort. The general outlines of that arrangement were, that there should be established in London, in connection with the Government, a Board to take cognisance of the health of the country at large, to superintend sanitary organisation, to collect authentic information on the subject, and to give advice to those who might require it. But the ultimate purpose to which the labours of this Board were to be directed was to create in towns and in districts local boards, self-governing, composed of persons belonging to the respective towns or districts, who, by their knowledge of the particular condition of the locality, and by the information they might acquire of themselves, or obtain from the General Board, might be in a position to make effectual those arrangements, and to adopt those precautions, necessary for securing, as far as human regulations may do it, the health of the quarter committed to their charge. The Act of Parliament then passed gave to these bodies large powers, but powers not more extensive than were necessary for the attainment of the object for which these boards were to be established. There was a certain process defined by means of which, upon an application from towns and cities, these local boards were to be established, and the powers of the Act to be consigned to them. And the Act had this merit also, that it guarded against an evil which had long been complained of, and which had been very severely felt, in respect to Parliamentary proceedings. One most serious obstacle to local improvements in former years was the great expense of carrying local Bills through the two Houses of Parliament. This evil, which had been long felt and generally condemned, was remedied a few years ago in a particular class of cases—such as the Inclosure Acts—by arrangements which have proved most satisfactory, and which have tended very greatly to the improvement of the country, while it had prevented much needless expenditure. Arrangements of a similar description were, therefore, adopted with regard to these local boards of health; and the result has been, that whereas in the ordinary course of proceeding the cost of each of these Acts would have been, upon an average, 2,000*l.*, these local bodies have been constructed under the provisions of the Act which it was now proposed to continue, and invested with all the powers that a local Act could have conferred upon them, at a cost varying from 150*l.* to 200*l.* each. From no fewer than 300 towns there have been applications to be brought within the operation of the Act; 182 local boards have been actually established; and in regard to all these a saving of five-sixths of what would have been the expense had it been necessary to go through the process of obtaining local Acts has been effected. The Act—the Public Health Act—has been continued from time to time, but it will expire at the end of the present Session of Parliament. Such is the present state of the question. But, I am sure that there cannot be two opinions as to the inexpediency of permitting arrangements which have been so carefully contrived to fall now suddenly into disuse. You are dealing with the interests of millions of your fellow-subjects—men who cannot take care of themselves, and who, if exposed without protection to the calamities which from time to time sweep over the face of the country, will become not only wretched and ruined themselves, but will become, through themselves or their families, a serious burden on the community at large; for if an unfortunate workman, afflicted with a fatal sickness, died, his family in all probability was thrown upon the parish. But, it must also be remembered that, even if death should not overtake either him or them from the want of sanitary arrangements in the towns wherein they dwell, the children are probably brought up in a state of disease, the consequences of which they feel for ever, and they are consequently dependent all their lives on private charity or the support of the parish—

"To help them through that long disease—their life."

This is, therefore, a matter which we are bound to take into consideration, not only upon grounds of humanity and duty, but also out of regard to the interests of those whose interests we are especially bound to protect. It is a matter which concerns alike the pecuniary, the commercial, and the moral interests of the country; and, as such, it has an imperative claim upon the attention of Parliament, and Parliament is bound to take care that those arrangements which now exist for the preservation of the public health should not be permitted to drop. At the present moment I think it would be peculiarly unfitting that such laws should be allowed to expire. I do not wish to create alarm—I frankly admit there is no ground for alarm; but the truth ought to be known: it would serve no purpose of policy to conceal the fact, that a terrible disease—a disease more terrible in apprehension than in reality—the cholera—prevails more or less in many parts of Europe; and that, during the last twelve months, it has prevailed with fatal violence in many parts of this country. We all know what ravages it made in Newcastle, and that it has been very severe in Glasgow. Even now it is showing itself in various districts of this metropolis. I do not, I repeat, desire to create alarm by this statement; on the contrary, I am sensible, and I should wish the country to be aware, that although the most formidable and fatal of all maladies if left to itself, it is, I believe I may venture to say, of all calamities the most manageable if taken in time, and if proper and scientific measures are adopted in its early stages. It is a fact established by experience, and attested on the authority of the most eminent medical men in Europe, that if you apply to the cholera in its earlier stages those means and methods which medical skill and science enable you to apply, you may almost in every case give such a check to the malady as will render its further progress impossible. But these means and methods require direction and combination. One of the most efficient and beneficial plans for preventing the ravages of the cholera that has been adopted is that which is called "house-to-house visitation," suggested by the General Board of Health—the system by which gentlemen, in a manner most honourable to themselves, formed themselves into committees, and undertook the task of going through their districts day by day, and ascertaining the existence of those premonitory symptoms, of which the persons who suffer them are hardly conscious that they mean anything particular, but which when pointed out and disclosed, render possible the application of remedies by which thousands upon thousands of lives have been saved. Amongst the Queen's troops stationed at Newcastle, last year, there were 800 cases of incipient attacks of cholera; but only four turned out fatally. These men, it must be remembered, being under the hourly inspection of their officers, and having the advantage of continual medical attendance in their regiments, applied for medical relief as soon as the disease manifested itself, and while they were stationed in that town, only four of them sank under the prevailing epidemic. I say, therefore, that upon general principles of public expediency, it is desirable to uphold this system; and if this be so in periods of comparative security, surely the case must be still stronger in a season of national emergency. Surely, at a moment like the present it would be something worse than madness—it would be absolute guilt—on the part of Parliament to deprive the country of the advantage of those medical arrangements against a calamity which may in a few hours overspread the land, which this Board was purposely established to provide. If we do so we shall pursue a course as criminal as it is infatuated, and we shall probably have upon our consciences the deaths of thousands, who, in the absence of such means of protection, will fall victims to a devouring malady. I cannot believe, therefore, that Parliament will hesitate to continue for a limited period the General Board, and the arrangements with respect to the local boards which have been established under its supervision. The question, however, fairly arises, upon what conditions the Board shall for the future be placed. On this subject I can have no hesitation in saying, that although the arrangements introduced by Lord Carlisle's Act had many recommendations, and worked well in many respects, yet they have not, on the whole, produced such a condition of things as it would be advisable for Parliament to continue. The constitution of the General Board was, in the first instance, one paid member, one unpaid member, and the First Commissioner of Board of Woods and Works. The latter was President of the Board only in virtue of his office as chief of the other department; therefore the Board was, to all intents and purposes, an independent body in the State, administering matters of the greatest public importance, but not under the control of any department of the Executive Government of the country, nor represented by any responsible organ in Parliament. This, I think, was a mistake. I think it was a mistake to place a Board having various and important functions to perform—functions in which many interests are, one way or another, involved, and which it was scarcely to be expected that they should be able to discharge without in some degree thwarting the views and projects of a large class of persons, who derived a fair and legitimate advantage from the previously existing state of things. Such being their position, and such the delicate and difficult character of their duties, it was, I think, upon the whole, a mistake to place the Board in the independent, and, so to speak, "unseen" condition in which it has hitherto remained. Therefore, although the object of the present Bill is to continue the Board for a limited time, and to a certain degree in its present condition, it introduces an important alteration in its government and administration. Its object is to connect the Board with the office of the Home Department, so that it may be a branch of that establishment. In a word, I wish to place the Board under the direct order and control of the Secretary of State for the Home Department. Not that the Home Secretary should be a member of the Board, bound to daily attendance, for that would be physically impossible; but that he should have the power of the appointment and removal of the members of the Board, and the right to give such orders and directions to the Board as, acting upon his own responsibility, he may think fit to issue. The result will be that the Home Secretary will be, in the first place, answerable for the personal composition of the Board; and he will be, in the next place, responsible for anything done by the Board of which complaint may be made. Either individuals or bodies, who may suppose they have a cause of complaint in regard to anything which the Board has done, or is about to do, will make that complaint to the Secretary of State for the Home Department, who will examine into the matter. If, upon a full consideration of all the circumstances of the case, he shall think fit to sanction what has been done, or what is intended to be done, he will be here to answer for the proceeding in his place in Parliament; but if, on the contrary, the complaint shall, in his opinion, prove to be well founded, he will make it his business to grant redress upon his own responsibility, so that no man may suffer an injustice. This, I think, will be an improvement upon the former system, which, I must say, was not altogether in accordance with the principles of our Parliamentary constitution. It may be asked, why place this Board under the Home Secretary? Simply because the Home Secretary is or ought to be Minister for the Interior, and there can be no business which more imperatively commands, or more eminently demands, his attention than the care of the general arrangements for the health of the country. If he does not do that, what is he to do? You may as well abolish his office altogether, as to deny him jurisdiction over concerns which are matters of vital interest—I do not mean a play on words—to the masses of the community. It is, in fact, the first duty, and the most legitimate function, of a Home Secretary to attend to such matters, and from which he cannot shrink. Even as it is, although I have no power over the Board of Health, which, as at present constituted, is an entirely separate body, and no more bound to obey my orders than is the Navy Board or the Victualling Department, I every day of my life receive from some part of the country applications connected with the business which the Board of Health is specially appointed to transact. One correspondent complains of defective drainage, another calls my attention to the fact, that an epidemic has broken out in a particular district; and thus I am, in one way or another, in continual communication with the Board of Health upon these subjects, although I have not a particle of authority over them, not the least official power to order them to do or leave undone any particular thing. The Home Secretary is, in my opinion, the man who, upon every principle of justice and sound policy, and from the constitution of his office, ought to be vested with the authority and responsibility of these matters; and it is for the purpose of conferring such authority and responsibility upon him that I have framed the Bill for which I now solicit the sanction of the House. It may be said that I ought to create a new office for this purpose, and that there should be a President of the Board of Health sitting in Parliament, who should be an entirely independent officer. If such a suggestion be made, all I can say is, that it is a new thing for Members of Parliament to press upon a Government the expediency of creating a new office which the Government do not think necessary for the public service. Looking simply to the convenience of Government, in regard to the divisions in this House, and looking to the three great objects of making a House, keeping a House, and cheering the Minister, I apprehend no Government would object to have a new office forced upon them by a vote of this House. But the matter is one of too great importance to be dealt with on the principle of party convenience. Consolidation, and not the splitting up of departments into various sections, has been the principle upon which administrative organisation has of late years been pressed upon the Government and acted upon by them. My right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty has made some arrangements of great value on that principle in the naval department, consolidating under one head various departments of the Navy which had previously exercised a comparatively independent authority, and the result has been most beneficial to the service. Parliament and the country have been crying out lately for the application of the same principle to the military department. Everybody has been saying that the separate Boards should be abolished, and that Commissariat, Ordnance, and barracks should be brought under one head to ensure unity of action and singleness of responsibility. This being the spirit of the age and the prevalent opinion, it would be an anomaly to separate the department of the Board of Health from the Home Office, and to constitute it a new and independent department. And, so far from any advantage arising from it, it is my opinion, the constituting it into a separate department would be productive of the greatest inconvenience and delay. The Home Secretary could not shut himself out from applications in respect to matters of this kind, and it is manifest that a correspondence between the Home Office and a separate and independent department would be attended with much delay, uncertainty, and confusion, and even, perhaps, conflict and collisions of opinion, all which would be avoided by placing these subjects under the responsible control of the Home Secretary. It is on these grounds that I submit to the House the arrangements contained in this Bill. It provides that the Board shall continue for two years; but, if the House should be of opinion that it would be better to limit the duration of the Bill to one year, that is an alteration to which I shall not object. Moreover, if next Session the House should be of opinion that it would be desirable to inquire, by means of a Select Committee, into what has been doing in this matter since 1848, I shall not be disposed to controvert the propriety of that course, or to oppose it in any way. I do not want to force upon the House my own opinions in this matter, but I do submit that it is expedient to continue, for a limited period, the arrangements that have been in existence since 1848, with the material alteration which I have already described—an alteration, the effect of which will be to bring the Board into active connection with a responsible public officer. Should it be the opinion of the House next Session that this arrangement does not work well—for I, like any other man, may be deceived in my expectations—it will, of course, be competent for them to reconstruct the system on any other principle that may be deemed most desirable. There is one other point upon which I cannot avoid touching, though I do so with great reluctance—I allude to the objections that have been made to some of the persons who constitute the present Board; but, not having had any detailed information of their proceedings, I am not now disposed to express any decided opinion on this branch of the subject. But this I do know, from returns and from facts—this I do know, in some degree, from personal observation—that infinite good has been accomplished, and that a system has been suggested and carried into operation which has had the effect of saving a great number of lives which would otherwise have been sacrificed to epidemics. I know also that applications have been made by no fewer than 300 towns for the assistance of the General Board in the establishment of local boards, and I know that local boards have been actually established in upwards of 180 towns, and I am informed that, notwithstanding that circulars have recently been addressed to all these towns entreating them to petition against the renewal of the Public Health Act, two or three towns only have complied with that requisition, while the overwhelming majority have spoken of the Act in the highest terms of commendation, and have expressed an anxious desire that the present law should continue and their satisfaction at the arrangements that have been made by the Board. On the other hand, I am assured that great personal unpopularity attaches to one member of the Board. I know not how the facts may be, but this I do know—and I am bound to apprise the House of it—that all the members of the Board have placed their appointments in my hands, and have declared in the most frank and honourable manner that, if there be any prejudice against them, well or ill founded, which is likely to impede the operation of the Act, or to prove injurious to the public service, they shall be ready to retire from the Board whenever the Government thinks fit that they should do so. I think it right, also, to inform the House, that in the event of the Bill now receiving the second reading, I mean to propose a clause in Committee assigning retiring allowances to such officers of the Board as may be entitled to claim them, on the usual scale of retiring allowances, so as to make it easy for the Government, if they should think fit, to enable members of the Board who may, by former services, have a just and fair claim to retire. I mention this subject because I think it is due to the persons concerned, against whom I know that considerable prejudice exists, that I should state the circumstances. I am sure the sense of justice will induce hon. Members to weigh carefully the facts upon which these representations have been made. Prejudice, I feel well assured, will not overbear the interests of truth. Englishmen are not apt to be run away with by clamour, nor is it their habit to condemn men without knowing why. It has been said that the Board have, in their defence, imputed base motives to large classes of men; but that is not a fair way of stating the case. The Board have certainly had to manage arrangements which conflicted with the fair and legitimate interests of many very intelligent and very active men. That part of their system which enabled the General Board to erect local boards out of municipal councils without the expense or delay of obtaining local Acts, necessarily took away the fair and ordinary profits of many a respectable man. The improved arrangements which they suggested conflicted in many cases with the interests of water companies, as well those already in existence as those which were merely projected. The methods of engineering which they suggested interfered, for a time, with the previous opinions and the employment of local engineers; and, all things considered, it is not to be wondered at, that great prejudice should be created against them, in many respects without good and proper justification. However, I do not wish to enter into a discussion of this subject—it is one which rests between the Board and their accusers. My object is simply the organisation of the department. I do not want you to pronounce any opinion upon the men; but I have their authority for saying, that they hope that no personal consideration affecting themselves will prevent any arrangement being come to which the House may think conducive to the public interest. I hope, therefore, that the House will perceive the propriety of passing this Continuance Bill. I think it a matter of the deepest possible interest to the great mass of the people in this country. At the present moment especially, to take away the means of guarding against an epidemic which is fatal only when it is not met by the anticipatory means which medical science affords, which means can only be effectually applied by consultation with some central authority, will be, in my opinion, to incur a responsibility which I should be very sorry to see the House of Commons taking upon itself. Well indeed would it have been for all the towns in this country if they had all adopted the same measures of cleanliness that have been adopted by some, under the superintendence of the Board of Health. Not the cholera only, but those diseases which now spread such havoc amongst the population would have either altogether disappeared or assumed a softer and less formidable character than they now, unhappily, present. Some hon. Gentlemen in this House are accustomed to lament the bloodshed and loss of life that inevitably accompany war, and there are others connected with agricultural interests who frequently deplore the injury inflicted upon those interests by the scarcity of husbandmen, which is consequent upon excessive emigration; but the House may depend upon it that thousands of lives are every year lost in this country which might have been preserved by better sanitary arrangements and more skilful methods of treatment; and I do not hesitate to assert that disease has deprived us of more men than all the ravages of war, or all the emigration ships that have ever sailed from England for all the ports of the world. It is a question interesting to every class—to the employers as well as to the employed. Upon the health of our people depend the prosperity, welfare, and greatness of the nation; and I hold it to be the primary duty of the Legislature to omit no means which can be provided by legislative enactments, or improved administrative and medical arrangements, for the purpose of securing the health of the labouring classes of the community, who are tied to the spot, who cannot fly from the pestiferous courts in which they live, who are compelled to see the pale faces of their children and their neighbours becoming more and more wan day by day, who are living in the midst of filth which I will not offend the ears of the House by describing, and who, even when no epidemic rages, are subjected to diseases which sap the vitals of their strength by deadly and irremediable poison. I conceive that, when by legislative enactment means could be afforded to that valuable and most numerous class of society to extricate themselves from those dangers to their health which they are now unable to escape, the House would take upon itself a responsibility I will not believe it will incur by refusing to adopt such an enactment. I shall feel convinced, until I hear the contrary, that no man who really feels as an Englishman—no man who is a friend to humanity—no man who is actuated by those sentiments which ought to animate every Member of this House—can propose to deprive the country of the necessary means of preserving the public health. I shall feel convinced, until I hear the contrary, that no man will get up in this House and object to the continuance of the Act to which this measure refers for the limited period proposed posed by the Bill. I beg, therefore, to move that the Bill be now read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

LORD SEYMOUR said, that, in rising to oppose the second reading of the Bill, he did so from no feeling of antagonism to the Government, or to the noble Lord who was so distinguished a Member of that Government:—this was no party question, and it would be a great misfortune were it ever so treated. The noble Viscount had spoken of this Act as having been introduced in 1848, and since then renewed from time to time; whereas it was passed in 1848 for five years, and to the end of the then ensuing Session of Parliament—so that this was precisely the time when the Legislature was properly called upon to review the operation of the measure, and nothing could be more unreasonable than the proposition of a noble Earl elsewhere—the non-official member and patron of the Board (the Earl of Shaftesbury)—that such review of its proceedings was an unhandsome attack upon absent individuals. The object of the Act of 1848 was twofold—to introduce sanitary measures for the benefit of the country, and to constitute a board for administering the functions created. As to the necessity of a Public Health Board, no one denied it; the point to be clearly established was the value of a Board which almost entirely depended on the manner in which it was administered. He thought he could show the House that, as the present Board of Health had conducted its proceedings, it had been a misfortune and a mischief rather than an advantage to the country. He would premise that, so far as he was concerned, the suggestion of the Home Secretary on a former occasion, that those who opposed the Board did so from feelings of personal or private dislike, was quite unfounded. He had no personal or private dislike towards the members of the Board; his whole communication with them had been of an official character, and his objection proceeded altogether upon official and public information, and upon public grounds. The Board, as appointed in 1848, was to consist, not, according to the noble Viscount's notion, of two paid and one unpaid member, but of one unpaid member, one paid member, and a president, who was to be the Chief Commissioner of Works. With such a composition, it was obvious that the Chief Commissioner of Works had a power which he could not have when they came to appoint two paid members. He had, then, a real controlling power over the Board, which was defeated when an additional paid member, appointed to carry out the Interments Act, came into operation; and with it was defeated also the intention of the Legislature. He had great respect for the zeal and charitable motives of Lord Shaftesbury, with whom he had acted most confidently on various Commissions; but there were many social principles of action which guided the noble Earl from which he entirely dissented, and those principles were conspicuous in the administration of this Board. The Public Health Act and the Nuisances Removal Act together permitted an interference with every trade and every occupation, of the most arbitrary and most stringent character. Inspectors might enter any house they pleased, order what improvements they chose to call so, and, if the improvements were not made by the owners, have them made under their own direction, and mulct the owners of the cost. These were great powers, which could safely and properly be intrusted only to persons who would exercise them with the greatest judgment, the greatest caution, and the greatest forbearance. The Board of Health had exercised them to a very large extent, without either judgment, or caution, or forbearance. The Board was not only an executive Board, it was also a legislative Board, enabled to make provisional orders which, in the case of rural districts, or of small places not protected by local Acts or by actual interposition on the part of the House, were carried out by Orders in Council, obtained almost as matters of form, but which then operated as Acts of Parliament. The noble Viscount said that the functions of the Board were to advise the Government as to sanitary measures, and next, to administer the law intrusted to their care. Neither of these functions had been satisfactorily discharged by the Board. As to their advice, the Government of the time had required the Board to advise it upon the subject of metropolitan interments. The Board took a long time—above a year and a half—in making inquiries, and involved the country in heavy expenditure in getting information, or what purported to be information, from all parts of the country and from abroad. In 1850 they had completed these inquiries, and prepared their scheme. What was their scheme? Its two great principles were, first, that the Board itself should be constituted a corporate and permanent body, to carry out the act which they recommended to the Government; and secondly, that the body so formed by the Board should have the monopoly of all the funerals of the metropolis, so that no one within its limits, high or low, rich or poor, should die, but that they were to be empowered to pounce upon the body, to bury it, and to exact a fee from the survivors. All the ordinary feelings of mankind were to be set aside, all the tender emotions of relations to be trampled upon, all the decency of mourning, all the sanctity of grief, to be superseded, in order that the Board of Health might get their funeral fee. So great and general was the alarm produced by the promulgation of the scheme, that the Secretary of the Home Office—the present Secretary of the Colonies—would only consent to take the measure up in a modified form, and, having greatly altered its scheme and provisions in order to allay the public feeling, presented it to the House, where it passed, still much to the dissatisfaction of the general public. That was one instance of the advice given by this Board. Let him mention another. The House would remember that there was a great desire in the public mind that some scheme should be brought forward for the supply of water to the metropolis. The public feeling, indeed, on the subject was so strong that the influence of the water companies would have been as nothing against it; and had the Government brought in any really effective measure of their own on the subject, whatever it might have been, there was little doubt it would have been carried. But, unfortunately, the Government again recurred to the advice of the Board of Health. The advice of the Board was, that they themselves, as a corporate body, should control and regulate the whole supply of water to the metropolis, that all the existing river and stream supplies should be abandoned, and that the 2,000,000 of persons inhabiting the metropolis should be left dependent on such supply of water as could be scraped out of the sand of the Surrey hills. That scheme of theirs was under the consideration of two Governments—of the Government of the noble Member for the City of London and of the Government of Lord Derby; but neither the one nor the other could make up its mind to adopt such a scheme. Both rejected it; both were necessitated to reject the advice which had been given by this notable advising Board. Where, then, was the use of such advisers? Why, their advice was worse than useless; it was advice which, if adopted, would have been in the highest degree injurious in both the instances he had cited. There was another occasion of recent date on which they had given their advice to the noble Minister of the Home Department. His noble Friend, indeed, had carefully guarded himself against the imputation that he had so wasted his time as to read the Report they had sent in to him, setting forth their advice in extenso; but, unluckily, he had taken their advice, which, proceeding on the premiss that the Commissioners of Sewers were going on very badly, declared that nothing would save the country but the adoption of tubular drainage, the pet device of the Board of Health. Thereupon the noble Lord sent a letter to the Commissioners of Sewers; and the next thing the public heard was, that the Commissioners of Sewers sent in their resignation in a body. There was general consternation as to what would be the result of the advice of the Board—general confusion. The Commissioners had, however, been got to work again—and how the noble Lord had managed it he could not imagine. What was the precise state of the matter now was not very clear; but such was the advice of the Board on that matter. Another illustration of the advising capabilities of the Board was presented in the Nuisances Removal and Diseases Prevention Act Amendment Bill, which, framed on their advice, Lord Shaftesbury had presented to the other House of Parliament. That was a measure which, so far from mitigating the objections which the arbitrary and stringent character of the previous Act had everywhere aroused, so aggravated the stringency of the existing measure, that when the Bill came down from the Lords, he (Lord Seymour) had, with the general approval of the House, moved that it be read a third time that day three months, and the noble Viscount had been fain to withdraw it. So much for another specimen of the valuable advice of this Board. He would put it to the House whether the public were to continue to pay a Board for giving such advice as that. Was it worth while to keep up an advising department on such terms as these? Their advice, he would repeat, was worse than useless; it was advice calculated to bring discredit on the Government and on the

Lord Seymour

House itself, which should, for a moment, entertain such councils. The advice these gentlemen gave was not limited to the Government or to the House; they advised on a much larger scale, but still at the public cost. He held in his hand a statement exhibiting how they diffused their advice. The House was aware that the charge for public printing was assuming an absolutely frightful aspect; that more than 250,000*l.* per annum was expended on this charge. And what sort of printing did they get? When the House ordered a public paper to be printed, they were satisfied with printing 1,000 copies, and a handsome number of copies too; but the Board of Health, when they ordered a paper to be printed, were by no means so satisfied. For example, their "Report on Extramural Sepulture," a lengthy document, of no practical use to the general community, but pleasing to the Board as an advertisement of their own merits, was printed to the number of no fewer than 6,000 copies, and distributed throughout the country, in such quarters as to the Board seemed most expedient for their own purposes. Then, again, there was their "Report on the Water Supply of the Metropolis;" of this 5,500 copies were printed and distributed; then came—1st, "Appendix to Report on the Water Supplies," 5,500 copies; next, 2nd Report, 5,500 copies; then, 3rd Report, 5,500 copies; and lastly, 4th Report, 5,500 copies more. This was an expenditure on the part of a public Board, at the public cost, which appeared to him totally indefensible. And, moreover, what were these so costly Reports? How were they made up? When Committees of that House were appointed to inquire into any matter of public importance, Members from both sides of the House, of different ways of thinking on the particular subject, were nominated upon it, in order that, by a comparison of various views, and an investigation of contending evidence, the truth might be realised. Such, too, was the object with Government Commissions; take, for example, the Commission on Limited Liability, where it was of the very essence of the question that the different views of opposing authorities should be elicited, so that by their careful comparison and sifting the real state of the case the true principle of action should be arrived at. With neither Committees nor Commissions was it the practice for three or four men, having preconceived views, fixed prejudices upon a particular subject, to meet together, and, having carefully collected only such evidence as went undisputed to confirm their theories and to fortify their prejudices, to send forth the one-sided testimony thus carefully prepared as the rule of belief for the community. Yet such had been the practice of the Board of Health, and, in consequence, their Reports were all unanimous, all one-sided, and all useless. Having thus reviewed the Board of Health as an advising department, he now came to consider them as an executive department. It had been his lot to have been himself in many offices, and, from this source and from the many inquiries in which, at the request of different Governments, he had taken part, he had a considerable amount of practical knowledge as to the working of public departments. Speaking with that practical knowledge, he was prepared conscientiously to say that he had never known or seen such a department as this Board of Health; it was a perfect anomaly; and it was fortunate for the country that it should be so—that it should be an anomaly—that there should be nothing at all like it. He would give an illustration of what he meant—a specimen of the proceedings of this singular Board. In 1850, the Metropolitan Interments Act having been previously determined upon, he had accepted office. This was in the spring of the year. At the close of the Session, that measure having been carried very much owing to the personal popularity of the right hon. Gentleman, then Home Secretary, the present Colonial Secretary, that right hon. Gentleman, acting upon the strong opinion which was evinced both in and out of the House that something should be done in the matter, that not a week even should be lost, came to him (Lord Seymour) as soon as the Act was passed, and asked him to see there was no delay in carrying it into operation. This was in August. He had, accordingly, determined, at much personal inconvenience, to remain in town during that autumn, in order to carry his right hon. Friend's wishes into effect, and had taken no vacation whatever, with the exception of a few days at a time, which themselves were spent in visits to places where the Act was to operate. Himself filled with this desire to carry the Act into effect without delay, he went to the Board of Health. The measure had passed in the beginning of August. On the 15th of August, Dr. Southwood Smith was appointed a member of the Board, for the purpose of carrying out the Interments Act. After Dr. Smith had been a fortnight in office, he (Lord Seymour) went to the Board to hear what they proposed and were prepared to do. He asked them, "Well, gentlemen, have you got into order? and, if so, what are you going to do? Have you made up your minds as to what shall be your first step?" "Oh, yes," said these gentlemen, "we have made up our minds what we shall do." "What is that?" "Well, we're going to Paris. We have had a Board here to-day, and we are determined to go to Paris." It appeared to him a strange Board that thus began their work by going to Paris. He said to them that it appeared to him they had quite sufficient information already whereon to proceed; that Dr. Sutherland had already been travelling for them, at large public expense, in France and Germany, wherever a graveyard could be found; however, as they did not seem to relish his objections, and as he did not wish to commence working with them in a state of hostility, he did not insist further; and the Board accordingly did go to Paris, taking their secretary with them, to write their letters and pay their bills. When they came back a fortnight afterwards, he took the liberty of sending for the account of their expenditure on this little trip, which he took to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in order to show him how the Board was beginning its work. The next thing he heard of the Board was, that they wished to appoint a number of persons to attend to the decoration of the burial-grounds. They wished to appoint, among others, Mr.—now Sir Joseph—Paxton, a gentleman at that time the great oracle of the town on all questions of taste, who was to be delegated to look after the decorative department of the churchyards; while another gentleman was to be appointed churchyard architect; and a third, Dr. Brown, was to see about the planting and laying out of the burial-grounds. His own impression as to the impropriety of these proceedings was confirmed by a letter to the Board from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, remonstrating with them for making appointments and determining upon expensive arrangements altogether without the sanction of the Treasury. In order that such objectionable proceedings might not occur again, he had sent to the Board of Health, requiring copies of all the minutes of their proceedings, so that he might see what was going on, it being impossible for him at that time—the Board of Works and the Board of Woods being then united—to attend at the Board of Health, who were in the habit of holding boards every day for some three or four minutes per diem. He had, however, gone to the Board on several occasions. He went to them, for example, on the 30th of January, 1851, at the request of the Government, in a special case, which was this: The Board of Health had proposed to buy up at once all the metropolitan cemeteries, and determined to render themselves and the Government liable for the purchase, amounting to 250,000*l.*, according to their own estimate, but to a much larger sum in the estimate of the persons who were to sell the properties. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had thereupon sent to him and expressed his entire objection to this arrangement—an objection in which he (Lord Seymour) fully concurred, deeming it most unwise to enter upon such an undertaking, and that the proper course would be to purchase, in the first instance, one, or perhaps two, cemeteries at either end of the metropolis, as the most practical means of testing the experiment. He went to the Board of Health on the subject. This was on the 30th of January, 1851. They had, at this time, received a letter from the Treasury, intimating that only two cemeteries should be purchased in the first instance, so that the experiment might be made with these, before the Board proceeded further. The Board read to him a long letter of seven pages, which they had prepared, and in which they argued the point with the Treasury. Thereupon, as the minutes recorded—

“Lord Seymour moved that a letter should be sent instead of the proposed draught, stating that the Board are ready to act on the suggestions contained in the Treasury letter. This Motion not being seconded, Lord Seymour stated that he wished that the Treasury should be informed, when the Board’s letter is transmitted, that he differs from it.”

Now, as to this matter, Lord Shaftesbury, in his place elsewhere, had stated that the thing had not happened as he (Lord Seymour) had described it on a former occasion. Lord Shaftesbury, speaking upon his honour, spoke, it was to be remembered, upon the information of the secretary—not having been himself present on the occasion—whereas he (Lord Seymour), having been present, spoke from his own recollection. However the matter might have been technically as to the non-seconding, certain it was that he had put the Motion he had mentioned, that it was not adopted, and that the long letter to the Treasury was. In consequence, he (Lord Seymour) had desired the assistant secretary to the Board to address to the Treasury this letter—

“The General Board of Health,

Gwydyr House, Whitehall, Jan. 31, 1851.

“Sir,—In transmitting to you, for communication to the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty’s Treasury, the inclosed letter from the General Board of Health, in answer to your letter of the 22nd instant, respecting the proposed purchase by the Board of all the metropolitan cemeteries, I am directed to state that Lord Seymour, the President of the Board, does not agree with the letter of the Board, and that his Lordship rather recommends that the Board should act upon the suggestions of their Lordships as contained in your letter of the 22nd instant. “I have, &c.,

“C. MACAULAY, Assistant Secretary.”

This was the first instance, in the book, of the differences between the Board and the Treasury, his position in which might be judged from the minute which he found at page 44 of the Parliamentary paper—

“Read—a letter from Lord Seymour, objecting to the answer which the Board had proposed to send to the Lords of the Treasury in answer to the letter of their Lordships dated the 13th instant, and recommending the Board to adopt forthwith the suggestions of the Treasury, instead of re-arguing the subject with their Lordships.”

It was said that the best course would be to renew the Board for another year, and have an inquiry into the whole subject next Session; but it seemed to him impossible to go on with the present constitution of the Board, and especially with its present composition. Lord Shaftesbury had made it a charge against him that he had never attended the Board; this was not the case, though it was the case that he had ceased to attend the Board when he found by experience that it was to no purpose that he attended a Board where he was systematically overborne, while he could occupy his time to really useful public purposes in his own office. The noble Earl had added that he (Lord Seymour) had told him, in confidence, that he never meant to do anything that he was not compelled to do. He would not be so discourteous as to go into any discussion with the noble Earl as to the expression so attributed to him; all he would observe was, that if he had said this to the noble Earl in confidence, his confidence had been much misplaced, for the noble Earl had taken the very first opportunity of publishing what he had said, when he thought he could bring it out to damage his character.

He (Lord Seymour) did not, however, wish to go into the matter, for he did not wish to occupy the time of the House with mere personal questions. With regard to the executive functions of the Board, the question was, if possible, still more important. Take their proceedings as to provisional orders. The Act provided that if one-tenth of the rated inhabitants of a place should petition the Board of Health to be brought within the Act, the Board of Health should be enabled to apply it. This, of itself, was opposed to every principle of the Constitution, that one-tenth of the population of a place was to govern all the rest, and to force such an Act as this upon them. Still, the power being enacted by Parliament, it might be so exercised that its objectionable features should be mitigated by the moderation of those who administered it. But how was it administered? The Act itself supplied no means of testing the validity of the signatures to the petition. A petition, then, coming to the Board, purporting to be signed by one-tenth of the inhabitants of a place, an inspector was forthwith sent down to the place, with no power, even if he wished it, to examine into the validity of the signatures. Nay more, the practice was that the inspector, so sent down, did not permit any inhabitant to see the petition; he said to the inhabitants, "You can't see it, you can't question it, you are delivered up, bound hand and foot, to the Board of Health." The unpopularity which such a measure as this must excite throughout the country was obvious. He could appeal on the point to the many Members who had, while he was in office, come to him, and asked to have towns struck out of the schedule. During the year that he held office under the operation of this Act he had himself struck out seven towns from the schedule after the Acts had been introduced relating to them, besides a good many more which he had struck out before the Act had been introduced. These, be it remembered, and others like them, were the cases of large towns or important districts which could defend themselves; but as to the smaller places and rural districts, which were without such protection, they were helpless as against the Board, which by their provisional orders, under the formal but effectual sanction of Orders in Council, completely overrode them. He had in his hands a remonstrance against this operation of the Board, received within the last few days, since the declaration of Lord

Shaftesbury elsewhere that the Board never forced its measures upon any place, which remonstrance—from Barton-upon-Irwell—energetically denounced the proceedings of the Board towards that locality. The noble Viscount seemed to think that matters would mend when the Board should be placed under the control of the Home Office; but, as to the smaller and unprotected districts, the control so anticipated would prove, with the present composition of the Board, and under its present mode of internal action, altogether nominal. The noble Viscount had contended that the whole principle of our Government was not to separate departments, but to consolidate them; but there was the striking example to the contrary of the Poor Law Board, which, having been under the Home Office, it had been found essential to separate from it, and to create of it a new department. The effect of the proposed control would be simply this—that when a grievance came before the Secretary at the Home Office he would write on the corner of it, "Remonstrance—for the opinion of the Board of Health;" and the Board would send in an elaborate Report to the noble Lord, which the noble Lord, according to his own announcement, would not waste his time in reading; and the Board would then act as before, except in cases where the parties aggrieved were in a position, by themselves or their representatives, to make a fight against the Board. That would be the course of things, and that was not the way in which the public business ought to be done. The Bill provided that there should be two paid and one unpaid Commissioner who were to be the Board. Now, it appeared to him that where the Executive Government was to be responsible for the proceedings of a Board, the amateur member proposed was altogether objectionable. He had great respect for Lord Shaftesbury's personal character, but he entirely objected to the noble Earl's grand principle of government—the centralisation of everything—the interfering with everything and everybody. Such centralisation, such interference, should be the exception, not the rule; and, where exercised, should be exercised with the greatest caution and forbearance. It appeared to him, then, that the most beneficial sphere in which the noble Earl could apply his ability and his zeal was in such general superintendence, as a legislator in his place in the House of Lords, over the Board, and other boards, as the case should require in his opinion, and he was sure always to be listened to with attention. With regard to the noble Viscount, he apprehended that the only effect of his assuming the control of the Board in the way proposed would be that the noble Viscount would feel himself called upon, whenever a grievance was alleged against the Board, to come down to the House and with some dexterous and amusing speech defend the Board—to throw the shield of his own popularity over their unpopularity, of his adroitness over their blunders. The noble Viscount had vastly entertained the House with laying down the rule that there was in every town a dirty party and a clean party, the dirty party being distinguished by their hostility to the Board of Health, the clean party by their affection for that body; but he must express the opinion that the jobbing of the Board of Health presented an amount of dirt which must be very startling to the clean party in question. The whole thing was perfectly monstrous. Some engineer whom no one else would employ, or some medical man whom nobody would consult, would be anxious to have the Health of Towns Act applied to his district; he would then get a few signatures, and would send up his impartial suggestion that a particular place could not get on without the interposition of the Board; the Board, jumping at the suggestion, would forthwith send down one of its elect inspectors, equally craving employment, who would, on arrival at the luckless place of his destination, place himself in communication with the doctor or engineering adviser, who being the person who had communicated with the Board, would thus have acquired a locus standi; the united pair would then consult with the surveyor of the local board, whose opinion, seeing that he could only be removed by the central Board, would be sure to take only one direction, and, by this combination of powers, the principle of self-government was utterly violated under the operation of this Board. He must protest against the continuance of this most objectionable system of great power exercised without anything like adequate responsibility. What he wanted to see was, some person made really responsible for the acts of this Board. He did not say that this person should not be a Cabinet Minister, that he should not be a Member of that House—not at all; but he wanted to see some practical man, well acquainted with business, at the head of the Board, and not a mere sanitary theorist. It seemed to him that the Board were always trying to make business for themselves, because they felt that they had not business enough to do. He thought that if they were to appoint a responsible head, with a secretary, instead of the present Board, such an arrangement would work far better than the one proposed. The noble Lord had talked as if all those who opposed the Board of Health, were opposed to measures for securing the health of the people; but this had nothing to do with the question before the House. What they had to deal with was, first the existing Act, and next the Board by which it was to be carried out. He admitted that the Act must be continued for another year, but not subject to its being administered by the present Board. It would be necessary next year to reconsider the question, and he was anxious to have independent persons at the Board, who might give their opinions as to the operation of the Act. The gentlemen who were now at the Board were pledged to the present Act, and it was not likely, therefore, that they would afford evidence which would tend to a diminution of the powers conferred by the Act. The present members of the Board had entirely lost the confidence of that House, and it was, therefore, absolutely necessary that they should be removed. The noble Lord said, however, that the cholera was approaching. The cholera was always coming whenever the powers of the Board of Health were about to expire; but, if the cholera was at hand, that was the very reason why they should establish a Board in which the public had confidence. It had been stated, in defence of the General Board, that many documents of the local boards bore testimony in their favour; but how were these things managed? He found in the Appendix to the Croydon Drainage Report that statements were given from letters represented to be received from several local boards, and among them was the following extract from a letter from Leamington—

“ I do not consider the General Board interfere unnecessarily with the local board; on the contrary, we have not been able to obtain their assistance so readily as we could have desired. We have, nevertheless, already found their aid and assistance most valuable, from the useful information we have obtained from them. Instead of our connection tending to augment expenses, I consider it has, in all respects, quite a contrary effect.”

The Report containing this extract was published in August last year; but he found in a local newspaper, in the autumn of that year, an account of a meeting of the local board, at which the publication of the statement was discussed, and the following resolution was unanimously adopted—

"That the clerk do, by letter, express to the General Board the surprise of the local board at the paragraph in question, which never proceeded from or was sanctioned by the board of health for the district of Leamington."

The statement seemed to have been sent by some individual, and the General Board at once published it in a Report, of which they distributed some 5,000 copies, and which contained other letters in their praise. The instance he had mentioned, however, certainly shook his confidence generally in these letters of commendation. When the local boards were established, they sent down inspectors, who usually objected to the plans that might have been prepared by any engineer, however eminent. He had in his hand a communication from Mr. Robert Stephenson—who might certainly bear comparison as an engineer with any officer of the Board of Health—in which he said—

"I have long entertained the strongest conviction that the detailed plans of towns required by the Central Board of Health prior to giving their sanction to the improvements proposed from time to time by local boards, involve a very unnecessary expenditure of money, and I have not hesitated to express this opinion unequivocally whenever called upon to do so. On this subject I have conferred with several very experienced engineers, and they entirely concur with me in this opinion."

The General Board of Health would have large and detailed plans, their inspectors usually threw aside the plans of the local engineers, and he had received letters from every part of the country complaining of the manner in which the proposals of excellent engineers had been overridden by the inspectors of the Board; at Grimsby, for instance, the plan of Mr. Rendle had been rejected in favour of some unknown engineer who was attached to the Board. Considering, therefore, the proposed constitution of the Board to be very objectionable, he hoped the House would decide that the Bill should not be read a second time, in order to show that they meant to have a Board that should be properly responsible to the House, and that they would not be satisfied with a Board constituted in the manner proposed by the noble Lord. It was clear that the Home

Secretary would not control the proceedings of the Board, but would only act when an appeal was made to him. He (Lord Seymour) thought he had stated enough to convince the House that the Board, as at present constituted, ought not to be continued, and he hoped that the House would reject the measure, in order that, in introducing another Bill, the Government might propose a Board constituted in a more satisfactory manner. He was not responsible for the measure having been introduced so late in the Session; for it might very well have been brought in much sooner, for it contained only seven clauses. He did not wish to interfere with the Public Health Act, but he desired that it should be differently administered, for the manner in which the present Act had been carried into effect during the last two or three years by the General Board of Health had not only been disadvantageous to the community, but most discreditable to the House. He, therefore, begged to move as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, he thought his noble Friend (Lord Seymour) had taken a very great responsibility upon himself in bringing all the weight of his name and character to bear against a Board as honest, and skilful, and as effectual, he believed, as had ever administered any public department. He believed if his noble Friend had kept up a more frequent intercourse with the gentlemen of the board, many of the bad impressions which he had formed of them would have been dispersed or forgotten in the consideration of the great zeal and earnestness which they had always evinced in the business on which they had been engaged. His noble Friend had adopted the principle of selecting certain exceptional instances in particular cases as examples of how matters in general had been managed by the Board; and had wished the House to take its conclusions solely and simply from those exceptions. He did not think that a fair line of argument, for he was satisfied that in the great majority of cases, of which the noble Lord had taken no notice, the Board had acted most judiciously and greatly for the advantage of the public. With respect to the proceedings of the General Board towards places in the country in which the Health of Towns Act had been introduced, the noble Lord seemed to wish it to be understood that the Act had been forced upon them against their will; but he (Mr. M. Milnes) could state that out of 182 local boards embodied under that Act, and which were now in full operation, there were only six who were in any dissension whatever with the General Board. His noble Friend had also picked out for ridicule a few exceptional cases of what he deemed ill advice given by the Board to the Government on certain occasions; but he had said not one word about the judicious and wise advice which they had given to the Government from time to time, and he thought the Government would be ready to admit that they had derived great advantage from the recommendations of the Board. The noble Lord had likewise cited the conduct of the Board in reference to the question of intramural interment and the water supply of the metropolis. But the noble Lord would surely admit that those were questions of a most complicated character, and surrounded with considerations of private interest with which it was most difficult to grapple, and with other practical difficulties which, perhaps, nothing but time would overcome. The Bishop of London stated that, if the advice of the Board had been followed in regard to intramural interments, that difficult and important question would now have been settled. He would place the authority of the right rev. Prelate against that of the noble Lord. Surely, it was no reproach to them that they had consulted the principles of taste in the laying out of cemeteries. In reference to water supply, the noble Lord had sneered at the proposal of the Board for drawing it from the Surrey hills. The question was one of great magnitude; but they were encouraged by what had been done at Preston, Manchester, and elsewhere. Much had been said of the relations of the Board with the noble Lord himself, and it was to be regretted that he had not entered more closely into communion with the Board, instead of only attending seven times during his whole period of office. The inference was unavoidable, that he had a strong personal repugnance to the members of the Board. It was undeniable that, amidst all the splendour of the metropolis, there existed more squalor and misery amongst the dwellings of the poor than in any other city or country. ["No, no!"] His own experience led him to the conclusion that there was nothing to compare with it. This being so, how should we set about remedying the evil? The principle of self-government was strongly upheld in this country; but, recollecting that in the case of public nuisances, the proprietor of a sal-volatile manufactory even maintained that it was conducive to health, and that the proprietors of other more offensive works did the same, it became a question whether some sort of police surveillance should not be exercised over these cases. It was a question how this could be done so as to produce the slightest interference with individual liberty, and whether the existing Board fulfilled this condition. The noble Lord had failed to show a single instance in which the Board had abused its powers. The only case which he described as a tyrannical act of interference was one where the Board had waited eighteen months before exercising the powers with which they were invested. As the noble Lord, therefore, had not made out a single case in which the Board had abused its powers, he (Mr. M. Milnes) thought he was not justified in coming forward to demand the suppression of a public department on the ground of a general abuse of power. It was said the House had no confidence in the Board; but that confidence ought to be based on careful inquiry, and an examination of facts and documents on both sides. The Board might not always have acted in the best manner, but the vast benefits which they had conferred on the country were not to be overlooked on that account. He hoped the House would not allow these miserable elements to form part of the discussion. Unless it could be proved that Mr. Chadwick or the Earl of Shaftesbury had abused their authority by applying the law to cases which did not properly come within its scope, the House ought not to concur in the rejection of this Bill. It should be remembered that the House had selected those men as the best to advise and assist the people of England in all sanitary matters; and it was a most paltry charge against them that they had published a few thousand more pamphlets than they ought to have done. If the House put them in a position of great responsibility, and, the moment they came in contact with private interest, sided with those interests, they had much better have never legislated at all, but have left the people to wallow in their own dirt. It was said that voluntary efforts were sufficient in this matter, and that all Government interference was unnecessary, as in the matter of education. He thought, on the other hand, that the prudent exercise of a central authority was essential for keeping in check unwholesome trades, pestilential manufactories, and other matters. This might create a little momentary unpopularity, but that would be far outweighed by the benefits to be secured.

Mr. HENLEY said, there was a very strong feeling in the country in favour of cleanliness, but it seemed as if the hon. Gentleman who had last spoken was resolved not to be satisfied unless everybody would consent to be cleaned by Mr. Chadwick; or, if they were unwilling to consent, that they should remain dirty. It was because the process of cleansing had been conducted in a manner very unsatisfactory to the great mass of the people that many of them were now doubting whether it would not be better to remain uncleansed than to be cleansed in the manner proposed by the Board. He (Mr. Henley) had taken some part in framing the Health of Towns Act. The subject was one of much difficulty and complication, and great discretion and skill were required on the part of those to whom were intrusted the large powers conferred by the Act. The question the House now had to consider was, whether a fortunate selection had been made of the persons to whom these powers had been committed? The Government showed, by the manner in which they introduced this Bill, that they—in common, he believed, with the whole country—had come to the conclusion that those powers had not been well and judiciously exercised. This was shown by the proposal to change the tribunal. The Board, therefore, must stand condemned, not only by the voice of the country, but of the Executive Government also, or a simple Continuance Bill would have been proposed without any change in the Board. The hon. Member who last spoke complained that it was unjust to condemn the Board when no instance of misconduct had been established against them. Why, if the hon. Gentleman was not satisfied with the “show up” the Board had received at the hands of the noble Member for Totness (Lord Seymour), he (Mr. Henley) did not know what would satisfy him. He (Mr. Henley) thought few Members in that House could have pressed into so small a compass such a tale of wrong-doing and mis-doing as the noble Lord had done in this case. The strong antipathy against the Board had not arisen from nothing. We were a long-suffering and a forbearing people; and it was only when we came to be kicked very hard, and especially on points very sensitive, that we could get up a feeling against the constituted authorities; and his hon. Friend might depend upon it that in this country it was impossible for any public department to fall into general disfavour so long as it discharged its duties properly. In this case he believed the Board of Health had operated more to delay than to facilitate the cleansing process. All the change, as far as he (Mr. Henley) understood it, which was now proposed by this Bill was, that the proceedings of this Board were to be removed from under the First Commissioner of Works, and placed wholly under the control of the Home Secretary, who was to be responsible to Parliament for their acts. Well, what would be the result? Why, the same thing that occurred when there was a Member of the Government answerable for the Poor Law Commissioners in that House. The noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston), crammed by the Board of Health, would come down to that House full of his brief, and from that brief, with all the strength of the Government at his back, would endeavour to carry this Board through all their difficulties. But let the noble Lord beware, for he might easily bring on his head a degree of responsibility much greater than he appeared to reckon upon. It was desirable above all things that this Board should be constituted so as to obtain public confidence. Their powers must necessarily be large, and in some degree unconstitutional, to carry out the objects they had in view; and it should be the business of the House to see that the persons constituting the Board were likely to exercise those powers with discretion and judgment. But in the meanwhile he thought it desirable that the Government should introduce a continuing Bill, and should reform the Board on some such model as the Poor Law Board. He thought, under the circumstances, the noble Lord (Lord Seymour) had taken the only wise course which he could have taken; and he (Mr. Henley), therefore, cordially supported his Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL hoped that before the House decided upon rejecting this Bill, they would well consider what was the exact difference between the Members who had spoken on opposite sides of the question. As to the first point, that there should be some body, some authority, administering provisions for the health of the country—this appeared to be generally admitted. The health of the community, the ravages of diseases and epidemics, and the best modes of counteracting them, were matters of such high import, that all must admit the essential necessity of some Board somewhere existing for the purpose of watching over them, and with adequate powers. So far, therefore, they were agreed. As to the precise extent of those powers, there likewise appeared to be no great difference of opinion. The noble Lord (Lord Seymour) objected to the power given to one-tenth of the ratepayers of any locality to have the Health of Towns Act applied to their town. He did not agree with the noble Lord, but this was a point which the noble Lord and other hon. Members seemed disposed generally to refer to a Committee to be appointed early next Session; and his noble Friend (Viscount Palmerston) had stated that the Government was quite willing that the duration of the present measure should be limited to one year, with a view to a consideration of the whole subject next Session. He thought that a proposition to which the House generally would be disposed to agree. As to the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, that would be impracticable; for, unless the House thought fit to sit continuously for the next six months, the proposed inquiry could hardly be terminated before the Board, according to his view, came to its end. Then came the question, presented with great ability and condensation by the noble Member for Totness (Lord Seymour), whether the powers now given to the Board had been exercised with discretion; or, on the other hand, with such indiscretion that they could not, even for the limited time proposed, remain intrusted to the persons who now exercised them? With reference to that, great stress had been laid on some points on which he quite agreed with the noble Member for Totness the Board of Health had been mistaken in the advice they had given. He conceived that the members of the Board had exaggerated views on the subject of central powers, and on the mode in which those powers could be used in this country. He knew that, as to one of these gentlemen, Mr.

Lord J. Russell

Chadwick, he had stated to that gentleman twenty years ago his opinion that he did not take sufficiently into account the habits of self-government of this country, and the desire there was in all local bodies to continue that government in their own hands. On the other hand, it would not be denied that, while local government was an excellent thing, still, as to many things, there was frequently such irregularity, such neglect, on the part of those local bodies—for example, as to the Poor Laws, as to the health of towns, as to education—that it was useful to have some general supervision, some general board, which should, at least, furnish information and advice enabling local bodies the more effectually to manage their concerns. Such, at least, had been the course of legislation adopted with the general consent for the last twenty years. The noble Member for Totness had instanced several cases in which, according to his opinion, this Board had acted indiscreetly and given injudicious advice. He was not disposed, on this occasion, to enter into any discussion on each particular case of this kind; but he would say that there were other subjects on which the advice of the Board had been of great importance, and on which its merits had been overlooked. He could say, for example, with regard to cholera, that the Report of the Board which, some four years ago, was founded on their investigations and experience was one of the most valuable Reports upon the health question which he had ever read in his life. It proceeded upon the belief, confirmed by all the experience of the Board and all their inquiries, that, though cholera was a disease most difficult to deal with successfully—a disease which, once established, had exhausted the highest art of the most scientific medical men in the world—yet that, when encountered at an early stage, when it had been only one or two days in a place, by close attention to premonitory symptoms, by house-to-house visitation, and by careful treatment consequent upon such visits, it was possible to a great degree to meet an attack of cholera, or at any rate very greatly to mitigate its ravages. No public Board ever rendered a greater service to the community than was rendered by the compilation of this Report—a report which in any future visitation of the cholera would, he was satisfied, be the means of preserving many thousands of lives; nor could any public body ever render a greater service than by bringing all the facts together, and then showing what had been the experience of the different towns and the results deducible from that experience. So with respect to many other matters, which he did not wish to go into then, he considered that the Board of Health had been of great public service. With reference to that which was the special business under the Board of Health, it had been shown that in 180 towns the Board had been invited to interpose for the improvement of the health of those towns; and it was important to observe, as touching the question of local self-government, that what was done in these towns was not the putting them under the Board of Health, "bound hand and foot," as the noble Lord had said, but that the Board of Health gave its advice and assistance in the formation of local boards of health, which then provided for the health of the place. The other ground on which the Board was attacked was in reference to the persons who formed the Board. He felt himself in a great degree responsible for the nomination of these persons, because, in one office or another, he had been very much concerned in the appointment of those persons. Of Lord Shaftesbury he would say nothing, for that noble Earl required no defence and no eulogy from him. There was no man living who had done so much as the noble Earl to promote the welfare of the working classes, or done it so disinterestedly or so unostentatiously. However men might dissent from many of his views and many of his measures, still this testimony would be readily accorded to him, even in his own generation, and most assuredly in the generations which should come after him. But as to Mr. Chadwick, who was the object of much obloquy, he would say a few words; and, while he stated what he thought favourable to him, he would not disguise in what he conceived that Mr. Chadwick's administration of public affairs was faulty. Mr. Chadwick was a man of the greatest energy, and with a spirit of inquiry which induced him to labour, by zeal, by unremitting attention to the subject in hand, to go to the bottom of it, and to attempt some remedy for the evils which he conceived himself to find there. He was appointed an assistant commissioner to inquire into the Poor Laws, and if in that large book, the Report of the Commissioners, they turned to the Report of Mr. Chadwick, they would find there the germ of that amendment which, in his (Lord J. Russell's) conviction, had saved the country from great social evils, if not absolutely from social revolution. He thought that this was a testimony which might be fairly proposed in favour of Mr. Chadwick. With respect to other subjects—with respect to crimes—Mr. Chadwick's inquiries had been of the greatest use to the country. The constabulary, which had been partly provided for the counties by Parliament, was very much the result of the inquiries which Mr. Chadwick made into the subject; and he (Lord J. Russell) trusted that in a future Session that valuable measure would be carried out to the extent which was requisite for the efficient police of the country. With reference to this subject of health, Mr. Chadwick's inquiries into the health of the metropolis and of towns had been carried on through various Commissions and investigations which had been undertaken on this subject; so that, on these various topics—the Poor Law, the improvement of the police of the country, and the improvement of the health of the country—there was no man to whose zeal and assiduity this country was more indebted than to Mr. Chadwick. Having thus stated what he regarded as Mr. Chadwick's merits, he would not disguise that, like many other men, ardent reformers, he very often, in his zeal for amendment, as he conceived it, overlooked or disregarded the objection and repugnance with which his views and propositions were received by others. Thus, when he was placed upon the administration of the Poor Laws as secretary, many of his proposals went altogether against the feeling of the country, were repugnant to the general sentiment of the country, and were therefore injudicious and not to be persevered in. With respect to this Health of Towns Act, no doubt, in many instances, Mr. Chadwick's acts had, in like manner, given offence. It was quite obvious that in many of our towns many of the ratepayers had rather be let alone than be called upon to take the measures necessary for their own health and that of their townsmen. There were likewise many persons who were pecuniarily interested that the plans of the Board should not be adopted, and it was very probable that Mr. Chadwick had not observed towards these classes of persons the most conciliatory tone possible. However, as to the persons forming the Board, his noble Friend (Viscount Palmerston) had already informed the House that every member of the Board had placed his resignation in his noble Friend's hands, to be made use of whenever the Government should think it advisable to dispense with their services. His own opinion was, that Lord Shaftesbury would probably think it too thankless a task to continue in his office. With reference to Mr. Chadwick, after the twenty years of labour which he had applied to the public service, at the cost of his health, now much impaired, it would not be deemed unfair that, were he to retire, his services should be compensated by a retiring allowance commensurate with the nature of the duties he was at present discharging. Mr. Chadwick, as he had said, had placed his resignation in the hands of the Government. With reference to Dr. Southwood Smith, it was very certain that, for the effective working of the department, a medical Commissioner was necessary, and it did not appear that any objection was made to this gentleman. Under all these circumstances, he ventured to submit that the proposal of his noble Friend (Viscount Palmerston) was preferable to either of the others which had been laid before the House—the proposal, namely, to continue the Act for one year, upon the understanding that, at the commencement of next Session, there should be due inquiry into the whole subject, the result of which would show what powers were thereafter to be vested in the Board of Health, and in what authority those powers were to be vested, and that in the meantime the Board should be placed under the general supervision of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, who should be responsible for its working. It was of the greatest importance that, for the next three or four or five months, the measure should have the services of those who were thoroughly acquainted with the details of the department, and not be placed all at once in the hands of new persons, so that the House, when it came to make the inquiry intended, might have the full benefit of the experience which the present gentlemen possessed, and not be in the hands of persons scarcely more experienced in the matter than itself. He ventured to submit to the House that there had been very little difference of opinion between the different Members who had spoken on this subject; that the rejection of this Bill would be a very unwise proceeding; and he hoped the House would adopt the plan submitted by his noble Friend.

Mr. HEYWOOD said, he should support the second reading of the Bill. He had received several letters from persons engaged throughout the country in carrying into operation the Health of Towns Act, acknowledging the obligations they owed to Mr. Chadwick, and, among others, the following from Dr. Peacock, addressed to Mr. Chadwick himself—

“Deanery, Ely, July 15, 1854.

“My dear Sir—I have read with equal pain and indignation the attacks which have been made upon your official character in the House of Commons and in the Times, and I think it is incumbent upon every one who appreciates the value of the important labours to which your life has been devoted to protest against such gross injustice. We are chiefly indebted to your investigations and reports for the first sound views which have been taken of the proper administration of the poor, and of the correct principles of sanitary reform; and it is to your courageous exposure of the jobs of parish vestries, water companies, and of engineers who have either an interest in the perpetuation of abuses or are too idle or ignorant to learn or to practise what a more enlarged and liberal experience should teach them, that you are indebted for the obloquy with which they are attempting to overwhelm you. I have no doubt but the triumphant success of the sanitary measures which are in progress under your auspices will speedily silence all your enemies.

“I can speak from my own experience, as chairman of the board of health at Ely, that we are, in a great measure, indebted to the kind support which you have given us for the success of our undertaking; without your support, our effort to effect the drainage and water supply of this place would have been stifled at its birth.

“Believe me, my dear Sir, very truly yours,

(Signed) “G. PEACOCK.”

He thought they ought to pass the second reading of the Bill on account of the important services which the Board of Health had rendered and was still rendering to the country. He was authorised also to state on behalf of Mr. Chadwick, that his medical advisers had recommended him not to continue in the Board.

Mr. HUME, before giving his vote, wished to know whether, if this Bill were read a second time, the Government would undertake as soon as possible to remove Mr. Chadwick, and to reform the constitution of the Board?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, it had been already stated that all the three members had placed their resignations in the hands of the Government, to be accepted whenever the Government might think fit; and as his hon. Friend (Mr. Heywood) had stated that Mr. Chadwick felt he was no longer able to continue to act upon the Board, there need be no longer any question about that gentleman.

The House divided:—Ayes 65; Noes 74: Majority 9.

Words added:—Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

THE BOARD OF HEALTH—EXPLANATION.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL rose, at the request of Lord Shaftesbury, to remove an impression which had arisen from words supposed to have fallen from him on a previous occasion in reference to the Board of Health. When that subject on a former occasion had been under discussion in this House, he (Sir B. Hall) had made use of certain words in allusion to certain regulations in relation to burial-grounds in the metropolis. He was reported to have said that those regulations emanated from the Board of Health in the one instance, and that in another Mr. Chadwick was the author. Lord Shaftesbury, however, had written to him to state that the Board of Health had nothing whatever to do with the regulations to which he had alluded; that they were entirely under the direction of the Secretary of State, and that as a Board they were not cognisant of, or a party to them.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, it was perfectly true that these regulations did not proceed from the Board of Health, nor were they at all intended as general regulations, but as recommendations in reference to one particular burial-ground.

NEWFOUNDLAND—QUESTION:

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON wished to put a question to the right hon. Gentleman as to the affairs of the colony of Newfoundland, upon which he had made an inquiry some time ago of the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Colonies, with regard to the demand of the Colony for responsible government. The answer then given to his inquiry was, that the Duke of Newcastle had sent out a despatch stating certain conditions upon which he was willing to accede to that demand. Since then he (Sir J. Pakington) had heard that the Colonial Legislature had rejected these conditions; and he believed a deputation was now in London, and had waited upon the right hon. Gentleman to ask what were his intentions on the subject. The question he wished to put to the right hon. Gentleman now was, whether it was his intention to recede from the conditions laid down by the Duke of Newcastle, to alter those conditions in any degree, or to adhere to them?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, it was quite true that the Duke of Newcastle had stated, in a despatch transmitted to the Colony, the conditions he thought it desirable to lay down before responsible government was conceded to that Colony; but he did not think the right hon. Gentleman had quite correctly stated the reception those conditions had met with. These conditions had not been rejected, but, on the contrary, three of the most important seemed to have been objected to by no party in the Colony. The first of these related to the compensation to be awarded to holders of offices, and the differences which had arisen on this point were only as to the amount of compensation, and were, he hoped, susceptible of very easy and satisfactory adjustment. With regard to the increase in the number of members, no difference of opinion existed, he believed, on that point. As respected the sub-division of electoral districts—one of the most important of the conditions referred to—a Bill upon this subject had passed the Assembly. It was true that differences had arisen between the Council and the Assembly upon this point, but they had arisen upon matters of detail which had been magnified into more importance than could be justly attributed to them. It was correct that the Assembly had deputed persons to see the Secretary of State on these subjects; and he (Sir G. Grey) was now in communication with them, and he hoped that the differences which had arisen between the Council and the Assembly were by no means insuperable. With respect to the question which had been put to him, he would, without adhering strictly to every one of them, express his general concurrence in the conditions laid down by the Duke of Newcastle.

INDUSTRIAL EDUCATION—(IRELAND).

Order for Committee of Supply read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Mr. LUCAS said: Sir, I wish to bring before the notice of the Government and of the House a subject of which I have given notice, and which has been some time on the paper. Notwithstanding the advanced period of the Session, I hope the House will be of opinion that I need not make any apology in introducing so important a subject, and in pressing that importance upon their attention and consideration. If any apology of that kind were necessary, my excuse might be found in the repeated requests made on the part of the Government that I would postpone the notice which has for some time stood on the paper. But another excuse, if excuse were indeed called for in this matter, might be found in the treatment of the Irish Land Bills, which had been under the consideration of Parliament during the greater part of this Session. Looking at the very peculiar and anomalous condition of Ireland—I mean the social and industrial condition of Ireland—I think it must be obvious to any one who takes an interest in the condition of that country that the Parliament of the United Kingdom owes a debt to that country, and that the people of Ireland have a great claim upon the Legislature to do all that in it lies to place their social and industrial affairs upon a better footing than they have been for some time past, and on which they still continue. During this Session nothing has been done with that view. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Serjeant Shee), and those who act with him, have for the last two Sessions pressed for a settlement of the land question; but the noble Lord and the other Members of the Government within the last few weeks have given us to understand that they despair of bringing that question to a settlement. That being so, and seeing that the industrial population of Ireland have for the present Session nothing to hope from Acts of Parliament, we are driven back to attempt to find some remedy for the social evils arising out of that question by other means, if any such there be. I don't know whether the English Members of this House are in a position sufficiently to picture to themselves the peculiar evils under which Ireland at present labours. I have heard some English Members of Parliament state that Ireland is in an extremely prosperous condition. I have heard it said by Gentlemen occupying a very high position in this House, that there is hardly a country in Europe which is in so prosperous a condition as the sister kingdom. I think that this is a great mistake, and the influence of such a mistake upon the proceedings of this House is likely to be so adverse and unfavourable to Ireland, that it is necessary I should say a few words on the condition of that country. I am not now going into the subject in detail, but I wish to refer to one or two leading points which I take from official statements of facts that, I believe, cannot be contradicted, and that deserve, in my opinion, to be very maturely and carefully considered. In the first place, I find it stated in official documents, which I believe cannot and will not be contradicted, that Ireland is in this peculiar position with reference to her population, that the annual births which occur in that country are barely sufficient to balance and equal the annual deaths that take place in it; that, in fact, there is no increase of the population at present; and that the large emigration which is now carried on is a net annual loss of population unbalanced from any other quarter. This is a statement which will probably not be contradicted. This emigration is not like the great emigration which is at this moment going on from the Atlantic States to the western States of America, in spite of the magnitude of which the population of the Atlantic States is very greatly on the increase; but it is a great emigration taking place along with no increase of the population whatever, and the whole of that emigration is, I believe, a loss to the population of Ireland. The Colonial Land and Emigration Commissioners, taking notice of this lamentable state of affairs, as I consider it, in one of their latest Reports, inform us that this state of things is not likely soon to be brought to an end—that it is not like the case of an ordinary emigration having its origin in distress, but that it has its motive power on the other side of the Atlantic, and is kept up, not merely by distress at home, but by large funds furnished by persons in America to their family connections in Ireland, and by which those family connections are from time to time drawn across the Atlantic. They have estimated the increasing sums which year after year are applied to this purpose, and the figures, which I may shortly state, are these:—In 1848 the sum thus furnished amounted to 460,000*l.*; in 1849 it was increased to 540,000*l.*; in 1850 it was further increased to 957,000*l.*; in 1851 it was increased to 990,000*l.*; and in 1852 it had increased to 1,404,000*l.* I may say, therefore, as a matter of fact, that since 1848 the funds have been raised from less than half a million to a million and a half, for the purpose of carrying persons from Ireland to America; and the Emigration

Commissioners say, "The emigration will not be averted by anything short of a great improvement in the position of the labouring population in Ireland." I know there are some gentlemen, not in this House, who look on this emigration with feelings not of absolute dissatisfaction. Their views are expressed in some of the organs of public opinion, and indicate a belief that the emigration consists entirely of Catholics, and that it will be a beneficial thing if this drain of the Catholic population of Ireland should proceed a good deal further. I don't wish in the least to go into any angry question between Catholics and Protestants; but I will refer to what fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland (Sir John Young), when the other night the hon. and learned Member for Ennis (Mr. J. D. FitzGerald) brought under the consideration of the House the condition of the police force in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman admitted on that occasion the fact that the emigration of Protestant policemen was much greater than that of the Catholic members of the force, and he eluded the inference drawn by the hon. and learned Gentleman of the ill-treatment of the Catholic policemen by attributing the fact which he admitted to the greater activity and energy of the Protestant policeman as compared with the Catholic. The fact, however, is admitted with regard to a section of the population which, so far as I know, possesses no peculiar features to distinguish it from the rest of the country, except this, that both the Protestant and Catholic members of that force are distinguished for their superior activity and energy, and that both of them are perhaps rather more disposed to the enterprise which results in emigration than other classes of the community. But we have at least this fact admitted, that in this respectable force, there is a greater emigration of Protestants than of Catholics. I only refer to this to show that the decreasing population affects all classes of the community alike—that it is an emigration which is going on to the diminution of all classes of the population—that it arises from circumstances which affect all classes of the population—and that it behoves all of us to see whether we can do something to put a stop to this frightful process, which, if it goes on at its present rate, will literally leave Ireland without a single inhabitant before the end of the present century. No one, of course, supposes that this consummation will actually be attained. Something will happen, of course, to arrest the evil; but when we are told that Ireland is in a prosperous condition, I cannot, for my part, consider a country in a prosperous condition of which it can be truly said that the tendency of the movement of its population is to come to an end before the expiration of the next fifty years. The Colonial Commissioners have, I believe, pointed out the only means which will really arrest that decrease—namely, a marked improvement in the industrial and social condition of the labouring classes in Ireland. It is the business of this House, I conceive, if it has any care for the social and industrial condition of Ireland, to do something to bring about that result; and it is our business, as Members representing considerable classes of the people of Ireland, to endeavour to press that subject on the attention of the Government and the House. Having to deal with an agricultural population, and believing that the only way to secure confidence in the industrial operations of that agricultural population was to improve the law regulating the relations of landlord and tenant, we have already done our best to find a remedy specially applicable to agriculture, and after two years of incessant labour in this House, preceded by labours out of this House not less strenuous, we have hitherto reaped no other reward of our labours than failure and disappointment. We have received the most disheartening reply from the noble Lord in reference to this subject; there is no hope, he says, whatever of bringing this question to a satisfactory settlement. The noble Lord shakes his head, and I am bound to think that I have misunderstood him; but I think I am authorised in saying that he expressed an opinion that it was extremely doubtful whether any legislation could be sufficiently precise to settle these disputed questions between landlord and tenant in Ireland. I think these were very nearly the words of the noble Lord, and there is really now by the Government no hope held out to us of raising the condition of the agricultural population by legislation bearing on the relations between landlord and tenant. Well, then, having failed for the moment on that side of the question, I think it is not improper for those who think that other legislation, not so directly bearing on agriculture, might have a beneficial result to bring forward any suggestion which they think holds out a reasonable hope of advantage to the community; and the suggestions which I have to offer are those which will raise no angry or hostile feelings between class and class—which will benefit Protestant and Catholic alike, landlord and tenant alike, the people of England and Ireland alike, and which can do evil or injury to no class of the community. The suggestion I have put on the paper of this House is in these words—

“On going into Committee of Supply, to direct the attention of the House to the propriety of instituting an inquiry into the best means of promoting Irish manufacturing industry by training or apprenticeship schools, and other similar establishments.”

It was difficult in the few words which were suitable for such a notice to express exactly what the proposition was that I had to lay before the House; but at the outset I would say that the proposition I have to lay before the House is, that the Legislature shall act much more directly in affording facilities and encouragement for establishing manufactures in Ireland than it has yet attempted to do. This is not a theory of my own—it is not a mere speculation on my part; but I propose to lay before the House an account of what has been done within the last seven or eight years with the greatest success in a neighbouring kingdom. I wish the House to enable the people of Ireland out of their own funds—for I make no demand on the Treasury; I am not asking for one single sixpence out of the public funds of the country—to do for themselves, and for their own benefit, what has been done with the greatest advantage and the most admitted success in the neighbouring kingdom of Belgium. In making such a proposition as this to the House, which is, I believe, in its main features perfectly new, I suppose I may have to encounter a good deal of opposition. I believe that opposition will arise mainly from the novelty of the proposition, and, as a necessary consequence, from the want of due consideration hitherto given to it by Members of this House. The great objection that has been urged against my proposition in private is, that for the State to interfere to promote the establishment of manufactures is to violate the principles of free trade. I believe if that difficulty were got over—seeing the experience which we have from Belgium—that really neither the Government nor the House could have very much objection to accede to my proposition. If that be so, it is proper that I should say a few words on the principle of free trade, as bearing on this subject. I believe the proposition I have to make does in no degree violate the principles of free trade. I make a great distinction between rules of protection which are intended to protect the permanent continuance of manufactures, and the interference of the Government in the first establishment, and in overcoming the difficulties which are found in the way of the first establishment of a new manufacture, especially in a country where very scanty manufacturing establishments are found. There is a passage in the report of Mr. Wallis on the New York Exhibition which is so exceedingly suggestive in reference to the point which I am now discussing that I will read it to the House. He says—

“The mutual dependence of one branch of manufacture upon another is so wide-spread and universal that, at first sight, the difficulty in commencing some of them appears so great as to convey the impression that it is insurmountable. It is not, therefore, a matter of surprise that many skilled artisans have, from time to time, returned to Europe, after an attempt to establish a manufacture, since the embarrassments arising out of almost unaided exertions, and an isolated position, were too great to allow them to do justice to themselves, or to those employers whose spirit and enterprise might have induced them to embark capital in such undertakings. The pecuniary loss of the latter has frequently been inevitable; and the early history of nine-tenths of the various branches of manufacture now flourishing in the United States, and amply repaying the present proprietors, is that of ruin; or of enormous sacrifices on the part of those who had the hardihood to become pioneers in those arts which now promise to become, at no distant period, of vital importance to the well-being of millions of industrious men and women.”

Now, I think that with some limitation, though I don't wish to prove the parallel to Ireland in every respect, these sentences might have been written in reference to three out of the four provinces of Ireland. If it be true with regard to manufactures which give employment to thousands of industrious men and women, and which are the foundation of great and important trades in America, that the real history of nine-tenths of them was, that they were founded on the ruin of the pioneers of those manufactures, I think there is a clear difference between the capacity of a trade or a manufacture already established to subsist itself, without protection, and the capacity of a trade or manufacture to establish itself, in the first instance, without help. And this is the whole point of the proposition I have to lay before the House. To take the phraseology of Mr. Wallis, nine-tenths of the efforts that have been made to establish manufactures in America have been bad commercial speculations on the part of the original speculators; and, therefore, it is obvious that if the original pioneers, as Mr. Wallis calls them, had been guided solely by principles of commerce, and not by that ardent spirit of enterprise which, in the hope of great success, very often disregards prudential considerations, clearly those manufactures which now give support and employment to thousands of industrious men and women would never have had an existence in America. Now, what I want is, that where these difficulties exist some aid should be afforded by the machinery of the State—not by money taken out of the public funds—but by some local machinery to overcome those local difficulties that are insurmountable in the ordinary course of things. That being the general view I take of this question, I wish to say also if any objection is taken on the ground of free trade, or of the impropriety of the Government of the country interfering with regard to manufactures, I think that is not an objection that can fairly be taken either by the present Government or by any Government of recent years. We have voted of late years considerable sums at the instance of the Board of Trade for the purpose of promoting manufactures. No doubt these were generally for industrial schools, or for normal schools, which could not in strictness be called manufacturing establishments; but it was obvious that these sums of money were not voted simply for the purpose of education, or the schools for which they were voted would have been placed under the control of the Privy Council of Education, and not of the Board of Trade. Why does the Board of Trade interfere with schools of design, with the manufacture of lace, with wood engraving, and with the manufacture of porcelain? It does so because all Governments of recent date have recognised the duty of the Government to interfere with the view of promoting and encouraging trade; and in order to provide employment for certain classes of the community, it gives aid to a certain class of industrial occupations to hold their ground against the manufactures of foreign States. You have already sanctioned the principle that it is the business, not merely of the Committee of Education, but of the Board of Trade, to deal with the question of educational training; and, therefore, you have sanctioned the principle that it is the duty of the Government to do such things as are prudent and feasible for the encouragement of trade and manufactures, even in this country. Well, then, all I say is, if you admit this, you give up the whole principle—you give up the whole preliminary objection; and the only remaining question is, whether the peculiar mode of interference which I propose for the Government is one which in itself is prudent and unobjectionable, and whether any objection can be taken to my proposal on the ground that it sins against principle. If it sins against principle, the conduct of the Government in proposing those Estimates equally sins against principle. It will be said that these are exceptional instances; but what do you mean by saying that these are exceptional instances? I don't understand how there can be these exceptional cases with regard to doing an injury to a community. The real question, therefore, between my proposition and that of the right hon. Gentleman opposite is, whether the proposal which I make is a prudent and proper one, and one likely to tend to the benefit of the community. I think I have now disposed of the preliminary objection taken to my proposition on the score of principle. I am unwilling to trespass too long on the attention of the House, but I hope the House, having regard to the importance of the subject, will bear with me while I point out some circumstances which, I think, show what a large part the State has borne in the history of manufacturing and commercial enterprise. Take this country, for instance. When a country attains a certain degree of manufacturing prosperity, I admit that it would be unnecessary to adopt a proposition such as I am now bringing under the notice of the House. There are large aggregates of capital, and the fullest knowledge and enterprise employed in manufactures in Great Britain, and there is at the same time the fullest means for carrying out any improvements in old manufactures, or in establishing new ones. But, even in Great Britain, go back to the history of industrial enterprise before the middle of the last century, and if you inquire how manufactures have been established there, what do you find? If you go to a period antecedent to the middle of the last century, when manufacturing industry was firmly established throughout this island, you will find, I think, three epochs at which this manufacturing industry received a great impulse, and in each of those epochs the impulse was received from circumstances which had very little to do in their origin with commercial enterprise, but a great deal to do with the interference of the State. The first period to which I would refer is the fourteenth century, in the reign of Edward III. Up to that time you had no very considerable manufactures. At that period you have the birth of what for many generations was the great staple manufacture of the country, namely, the woollen trade. How did that originate? Why, it originated, not in private enterprise, but in the invitation to this country from the Low Countries of a number of weavers, dyers, and fullers, who introduced into London, Bolton, Norwich, and other English towns, the manufacture of fine woollen cloth which had no previous existence there. Two centuries later you have another great advance in the manufacturing industry of England. During the civil wars which desolated the Low Countries, and in which the city of Antwerp was sacked and destroyed by the Spanish General, the Duke of Alva, about one-third of the manufacturers and merchants in that city, who wrought and dealt in silks, damasks, taffeties, bays, sayes, serges, and stockings, came over to England, where they were hospitably received, and introduced a great many of those manufactures which did not exist here before. According to an English historian of our national industry the rise of the manufacturing industry of this country may be said to date from the fall of Antwerp. The third period is the end of the seventeenth century, when you have the revocation of the edict of Nantes. Then, something like 70,000 manufacturers and workmen were driven by the folly of Louis XIV. into this country, where they were hospitably received by the people and the Government. Large sums were spent to establish them here, and that not merely from motives of humanity and religious sympathy, but from motives of commercial prudence, and from the belief—and experience has proved that that belief was not unfounded—that the introduction of so many skilful artisans into manufactures which were imperfectly carried on before in this country, and of processes of manufacture not known here at all, would be of the greatest possible commercial benefit to this kingdom. And so it has proved; and I believe it will now be difficult to find any three manufacturing epochs in the history of England before the middle of the last century which are at all to be compared to the three periods to which I have referred, and to the events connected with them; and it may be truly said that, if you take away these three epochs, the manufacturing industry of this country would not have grown up to the high position in which it was found a century ago, and would not have experienced the extraordinary development which it has since received. There is no country in Europe which does not furnish me with examples of great leading branches of industry which have been introduced into them, not by private enterprise and prudence, but by the wisdom of States and monarchs taking advantage of political circumstances to introduce into their own countries trades and manufactures which had not before flourished there. What, for example, is the history of the silk trade? It came, as we all knew, from China. For a long period the manufacture of silk and the culture of the silkworm were confined to China. It was afterwards transferred to Constantinople about the sixth century, and thence to Greece. How did it get from China to Constantinople? Not by commercial enterprise. It was introduced into Constantinople by the Emperor Justinian, who was at considerable expense in inducing two Persian monks to bring over in canes the eggs of silkworms, and along with them the knowledge of the various processes by which the manufacture was conducted. From Constantinople it travelled into Greece, and from thence into Sicily and the south of Italy, where it was carried most unquestionably, not by commercial enterprise, but by an act of public rapine on the part of an adventurer, Roger, the Norman King of Sicily, who, being on a plundering expedition in Greece, brought home, as part of his plunder, several silk manufacturers, and established them in Palermo and in Calabria. The manufacture afterwards spread throughout Italy, and subsequently came into France—but how? Not by mere private commercial enterprise, but by the act and patronage of the State—by the Act of Louis XI., who brought the silkworm to Tours—by that of Francis I., who brought it to Lyons—and by that of Henry IV., who brought it to Paris. I might cite many other instances, and if I do so it is because my case is very much supported by the general interference of States and Legislatures in introducing manufactures at different periods in the history of the world. Take, for instance, Geneva, in Switzerland, which is unquestionably the centre of a great manufacturing population, and which owes the origin of most of its manufactures, not to mere commercial enterprise, but to civil convulsion, and to a wise prudence on the part of the Swiss community in taking advantage of those convulsions. The watchmakers of Geneva were originally citizens of Paris, but they were driven out of that city by the revocation of the Edict of Nantes; and by their means the watch trade of Geneva, and many other trades, along with great improvements in agriculture and gardening, were introduced into that part of Switzerland. The establishment of those trades was in great part completed after an interval of several generations by the French Revolution, which drove out the remaining artisans of that class from Paris to Geneva; and thus Geneva owes its commercial and industrial prosperity, not to the mere spontaneous impulse of commercial enterprise, but to its citizens prudently and wisely taking advantage of political circumstances and hostile convulsions to introduce and settle among them many of those trades and manufactures which did not exist among them before. The last example with which I shall trouble the House is one very appropriate to the condition of Ireland. It is the case of Prussia. Long after the close of the thirty years' war Prussia lay devastated by the ravages committed during the war; many of its towns had been in great part destroyed—many of them had lost half, and others of them five-sixths, of their houses and populations. The country had become a perfect waste; agriculture was neglected, and trade and manufactures were entirely destroyed. How was the country revived? It was revived by the action of the Great Elector, as he was called, by his adoption of a course of policy almost exactly similar to that which the House is now asked to sanction. An opportunity was afforded for his entering upon that course of policy by the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. The moment that that great Sovereign—for he was one of the greatest Sovereigns of his time, and his name will never be forgotten in Prussia—learnt that the banishment of the Protestants from France was taking place, he issued an edict from Potsdam inviting them to settle within his territory. He sent his agents to Amsterdam, Frankfort, and Hamburg, who supplied as many as chose to avail themselves of his invitation with money, guides, provisions, and other means of travelling; he gave them houses and settlements in land, and furnished them with the means of living until they were able to establish themselves; and in the places in which they settled they afterwards carried on the various manufactures of which they were masters. The wealthiest and richest of them came to England and Holland; but the Great Elector was obliged to take the very poorest of them, and to maintain them for some time at his own cost; but by doing so, and by thus introducing the manufactures with which they were acquainted, he changed in a short time the very face of Prussia, and, after a generation or two, a country which, when he came to the throne, was almost entirely a desert waste, became able to encounter in the shock of arms the greatest potentates of Europe banded against her. I think the case of Prussia is of happy augury if applied to Ireland. Although Ireland is at this moment destitute of manufactures, and although her people are flying from her shores by thousands, I see no reason, if a proper policy be adopted towards her by the Government, why that decrease of the population should not be arrested, and why the whole country should not flourish with manufactures and agriculture, and should not become the home of a happy and a contented people. I now wish to say a few words to the House about the more immediate nature of the proposition which I have to make on this occasion. The example I ask you to follow is that of Belgium. I have been met with this objection, that it is not necessary to go to foreign nations to see what may be done in establishing manufactures, because in all industrial matters we are far before the Continent, and it is therefore quite enough to look at home. It is precisely because that is in a certain sense true that I go to a foreign nation. Ireland has not prospered. England and Scotland have prospered, but Ireland has not. I wish to take an example from a foreign country very much resembling Ireland, and very considerably behind England and Scotland in commercial enterprise and in accumulated capital, and, therefore, a much fitter subject for comparison with Ireland than Great Britain can be. There are many points of resemblance between the provinces of Belgium and Ireland. In Belgium you have a population in great part agricultural, with small farms, small capitals, and small manufactures. Up to a very recent period—up to less than ten years ago—almost the sole manufacture of the two provinces of Flanders was the manufacture of linen in its simplest shape. The manufacture was conducted by machines of the rudest kind, and for twenty or thirty years past it was the necessary, and, indeed, the inevitable result, that the people engaged in it should feel all the effects of competition with the great capitals and the improved machinery of this country. From 1831, and later, the Flemish manufacturers of linen were in a state of great distress. Many means were attempted by the Belgian Legislature to put an end to this state of things. They attempted high protective duties, but these failed and were soon abandoned. Then, after a little time, there came a disaster exactly similar to that which visited Ireland—the failure of the potato crop—and the weavers devoting part of their time to the cultivation of the land, and subsisting very much on potatoes, there were superadded to the distress to which they were subject by competition with the capital and improved machinery of other countries, the greatest extremity of famine, of which they were the victims. The Belgian Legislature endeavoured to meet this great calamity by means similar to those which were tried in the first instance in Ireland. They had industrial committees for providing food and work to the famished people, but the result was to disorganise still further the linen manufacture, and to aggravate permanently the evils under which the people were labouring. Eventually they came, partly by individual experiments, which were followed up with great prudence and judgment by the Belgian Legislature and Government, upon the very system to which I am now calling the attention of the House. An experiment was made at Roulers, a town in Western Flanders, the object of which was, not to provide work without reference to the commercial circumstances of the case, but to introduce and establish the newest processes into manufactures already in existence there, and to introduce new manufactures. That was first attempted by the town of Roulers, and the experiment succeeded. Another experiment of a like kind was made by the town of Ghent, and with equal success; with so much success indeed that a general law was passed to carry out the principle. In a very short time after the experiment was tried at Roulers, at least eight or ten new manufactures were introduced, and are now flourishing there. [The hon. and learned Gentleman then read extracts from a Report showing the great advantages that had been derived from the introduction of the system in East Flanders, and in other parts of Belgium, the ateliers having been established in sixty-eight places.] Now, at what expense to the State have these enormous results been attained?—and I am persuaded that no Member in this House will deny them to be enormous results—at what expense, I say, have these results been brought about in East and West Flanders? Why, the total expense for five years, in the two provinces of East and West Flanders has amounted to 36,788*l.*, or about two and a half per cent on the county cess of Leinster. Besides, the current expenses are diminishing. I find for the year 1850 those expenses amounted, for the two provinces, to 3,416*l.*, or about one and a quarter per cent on the Leinster county cess. I am asking you now to introduce these establishments into Ireland at the risk of the people themselves—I am not asking you for any supplies from the public Treasury—I am asking you to give the counties of Ireland the power of managing their own affairs, and of taking steps like these for their own improvement at their own risk—and I am perfectly willing that this should be done, subject to some central revision on the part of Government to prevent fraud or mismanagement, if any person should be inclined so to act. I am not, of course, submitting at this moment any Motion to the House. The proposition which I have laid before the House is a new one; and it was necessary for me to find some opportunity during the present Session to make such a statement as this, in order to elicit from the Government some opinion upon the subject as to whether they think it practicable to accomplish anything in this way for Ireland, since an impression exists—which I still hope is an erroneous one—from the language lately held by the Government, that no encouragement is to be given to agriculture, which is the staple industry of Ireland, by any immediate settlement of the relations between landlord and tenant. I commend this proposition particularly to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, but most particularly to the noble Lord the President of the Council. The words of the noble Lord appear calculated to destroy, though I for one hope it is otherwise, any hopes that might be entertained, or might spring from the conduct of the Government, in reference to the land question. But should the words of the noble Lord fairly bear the interpretation that has been attributed to them, I would press it upon the noble Lord and the Government that they should at least hold out some hope that, in other industrial pursuits, a fair amount of encouragement and means of improvement will be afforded to the people of Ireland by that which Parliament and the Government can do for their benefit without incurring any expense, and almost without incurring any trouble.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that, before he made any observations respecting the early part of the speech of the hon. Member for Meath, he wished to make a very short statement with regard to what the hon. Gentleman had said as to his (Lord J. Russell's) opinion in respect to the land question in Ireland, to which the hon. Gentleman had more than once alluded. At various periods of late years measures had been introduced in reference to the subject of landlord and tenant in Ireland; and, last year, Bills were referred to a Select Committee, which, having afterwards undergone the consideration of the House, were sent up to the House of Lords, containing everything which was thought could be done in the way of justice to the tenant. Those Bills were not introduced this year in the House of Commons, but were originally considered in the House of Lords, who took a different view of the subject from that which had been previously taken by the House of Commons. Their Lordships passed Bills which they thought contained everything that could be done by legislation for settling all questions that might exist in dispute between landlord and tenant; but when the Bills came down to that House there was a general disposition, on the part of all those who thought there ought to be, on the landlord and tenant question, a Bill more favourable to the tenant than at present existed, to consider that those Bills had far better not be proceeded with, believing that, instead of settling the question, they would excite great discontent and dissatisfaction. Such being the case, he certainly inferred—and he did not think it required any great sagacity to arrive at the inference—that it was hopeless, or, at all events, extremely difficult, in the present Session at least, that any agreement between the two Houses could be arrived at that should be satisfactory to the people of Ireland.

The hon. Gentleman had adverted to something which was supposed to have been stated by him (Lord J. Russell) on a former occasion, when those Bills were the subject of consideration. Now, he did not consider the question as hopeless, neither did he express himself to that effect. What he did say was, that he thought the best way in which to begin legislation on the subject was by taking care to provide in the fullest manner possible for encouraging and maintaining voluntary contracts between landlord and tenant; and that if that were done, there might be a hope entertained that the parties standing in the relation of landlord and tenant might be drawn near and more near to one another, and that the great landlord and tenant question might at some no distant day be set at rest. But he did not say, as had been imputed to him, that it was a question the settlement of which was utterly hopeless. Having said thus much with regard to the question of the land, he would now say a few words with respect to the proposition of the hon. Gentleman. He would not say anything that evening at all decisive upon the very interesting subject which the hon. Gentleman had introduced, as to the rise and progress of manufactures in Belgium. Without being more informed than he was as to the manner in which the linen manufactures in Flanders were founded, and what particular measures were introduced, and the mode in which they were carried into effect, he should not give any positive opinion on the subject. But it appeared to him that there were some clear principles to which the House ought to adhere, and that among those principles there was one, that education and instruction of any kind might come within the province of the Government; and that, therefore, as was the case in many manufacturing towns with respect to manufactures, and with respect to the general laws upon the question of machinery, instruction might be very well given under the superintendence of the Government. But it was quite clear that all instruction of that kind was given by an outlay and an expense on the part of the Government, and that it did not pretend to be a remunerative process. It was a general mode of instruction, from which all manufacturers, in whatever branch of industry they might be concerned, might derive advantage. It was, however, a totally different thing for the Government to carry on agriculture or manufactures of any kind as a branch of commerce. Government could not pretend to gain a profit by such a system. He was of opinion that one course of proceeding might be very wisely pursued by the Government, whereas the other course of proceeding would be very unwise, and had been uniformly found to fail wherever Government sought to interfere with the profits of industry, which should be the remuneration of individual labour and enterprise. The hon. Gentleman had alluded to the number of artisans who had come to England, and who had gone to other Protestant countries—Prussia and Switzerland—in consequence of the Flomish persecution, of the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and of the French Revolution. But all that proved that freedom of conscience was a great advantage to a country, and that a Government which protected freedom of conscience protected at the same time the development of individual skill and industry. Those emigrations to this and other Protestant countries occurred not by reason of any persecution of manufacturers in Flanders or in France, but in consequence of those general principles of freedom, both civil and religious, which happily existed in those Protestant countries. The hon. Gentleman had referred to the flourishing state of the woollen manufactures both in Tuscany and in Spain, and which he partly ascribed to the encouragement on the part of the Government; but that, since the Government of those countries had changed, their manufactures had decayed; that a great woollen manufacture had been established in this country, while in Florence and in Seville it had died away. But all these changes were not owing to the one Government giving instruction in manufactures, and to the other Government neglecting it; but it was owing to the Governments of Florence and of Spain having become so bad that all individual enterprise was checked, while in this country, in consequence of the liberty which the people enjoyed, individuals had the means of carrying on whatever enterprise their talent and industry might lead them to engage in. He believed that these principles would ever be found of great advantage to a nation. Whether or not there should not be more instruction given on these matters was a question on which he did not wish to enter. He believed there were at the present moment schools of instruction under national boards in several places on the Continent. There was at Paris a great school of this kind; in

Carlsruhe there were two schools—one for agriculture and another for manufactures; in Ghent and in Liege there were also similar schools. These schools might be worthy of imitation; and he was not prepared to say that like institutions might not be carried further in Ireland. But without giving any opinion as to any particular course pursued in Belgium, in Berlin, or in other countries, he thought they must always have regard to those principles which generally governed the course of nations in this respect.

Mr. JOHN MACGREGOR said, that the interference of the Government of a country, instead of aiding, suppressed the energies of a people. The hon. Member for Meath had alluded to Switzerland; but the manufactures of that country depended not on the aid of Government, but on individual enterprise. He was extremely anxious that no delusions on the subject should go forth among the people of Ireland, but that they should thoroughly understand that, unless manufacturing industry originated with the people themselves, and from their own thrift and skill, the interference of Government could do them no good. It was only under a government of civil, political, and religious liberty, and where the people were themselves industrious, that a nation could ever become a prosperous and a rich manufacturing and great commercial people.

Mr. J. BALL said, that, considering the position of the noble Lord, a statement had fallen from him to which he thought it proper to call attention. The noble Lord had said that the falling off of the manufactures of Tuscany was owing to the Government of that country becoming so bad that no industrial pursuits could flourish under it. He (Mr. Ball) was quite sure that that statement did not apply to the history of Tuscany within the last 150 years; it was, however, unhappily quite true, in reference to the state of Tuscany for the last year or two, and he deeply regretted it. But the general government of Tuscany had been considerably in advance of all the rest of the south of Europe, at least in the tone of its administration and in the spirit of its constitution.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL, in explanation, was understood to say that he had alluded to the suppression of the laws and liberties of Florence in the time of Charles V., but had not referred to more recent times.

MR. MAGUIRE thought the Government ought to have done something more than give a mere passing notice of the speech of his hon. Friend the Member for Meath. They were ready to vote anything for the prosecution of the war, and, surely, the Government ought to make some effort for the restoration of a country which was a complication of disorders. Irishmen were constantly asked, why they were not industrious, and why they did not display the same energy as other nations did? But, what had been the history of Ireland for the last 100 years? He gave the present Government and their predecessors credit for having done everything in their power to promote education in Ireland; but the people required a different kind of education. The explanation of the noble Lord with respect to the landlord and tenant question was by no means satisfactory. If the noble Lord wished to hand down his name as a great statesman, and as one who knew how to deal with an unhappy country, he would earnestly grapple with the land question. There was a great manufacturing spirit going on in Ireland at the present moment, which required to be sustained. He called upon the noble Lord to turn his great mind towards the condition of Ireland, and to see that between this and the next Session some scheme be devised to carry out the views of the hon. Member for Meath.

MR. APSLEY PELLATT said, that Ireland seemed to be an exception to almost all the principles of political economy, and Government appeared to be contributing to carrying out that exception. He had been over the farm at Glasnevin, and had examined the agricultural condition of Ireland, and he found that they were making progress, and that great satisfaction had arisen from the experience derived from that establishment. Seeing that the application of the principle contended for had succeeded in respect to agriculture, he was not aware of any strong reason why it should not be equally successful in its application to manufactures, as advocated by the hon. Member for Meath. It might be contrary to all principles of political economy, but if, notwithstanding, the principle had succeeded in Belgium, why should it not operate equally beneficially in Ireland?

MR. KENNEDY contended that it was ungenerous to refuse this appeal, which demanded no pecuniary sacrifice from the State, but merely asked the House to give local authorities in Ireland power to try an experiment which had proved eminently successful in Belgium. There were 163 monster workhouses in Ireland, which might be rendered capable of doing enormous good to the people of Ireland in the direction pointed out by his hon. Friend. There was a great diminution in the number of inmates in those workhouses, and a further diminution was expected. He calculated that from one-fifth to two-fifths of the workhouses in Ireland might be spared in the course of two years, and made available for industrial schools. This would afford a nucleus for such operations as his hon. Friend suggested. They would, in the way he pointed out, be able to provide without cost sixty-four industrial schools in Ireland, or two for each county. These, in connection with the national schools, would be ample to carry out a substantial system of industrial training. It was his intention to bring the subject forward next Session.

Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—MISCELLANEOUS ESTIMATES.

House in Committee of Supply; Mr. BOUVIER in the Chair.

(1.) 2,055*l.*, Chapel at the Embassy, Constantinople.

SIR JOSHUA WALMSLEY said, he wished for some explanation of this Vote.

MR. J. WILSON said, about six or seven years ago the chapel was accidentally burned down, and, owing to the extravagant expenditure lavished on the building of the embassy house, had not been rebuilt. Two or three years ago, a Vote was proposed of 4,350*l.* for the purpose, but was then withdrawn, in consequence of the lavish expenditure to which he had alluded. Strong representations of the inconvenience felt by the British residents had been made to the Ambassador, and even offers to contribute 1,000*l.*, though their numbers were small. The arrangements now made were such that the House would not be called upon for more than the sum now proposed. The want of accommodation, where a large number of sailors resorted, besides the residents, had been severely felt, and he hoped, therefore, the Committee would assent to the Vote. An architect from the Board of Works would go out to superintend the building, but he would be under the control and direction of the Ambassador.

Mr. J. WILSON said, the architect and the same gentleman who supervised the erection of the embassy house. The arrangements then were very imperfect, as that gentleman was not responsible to any one on the spot.

(2.) 1,400*l.*, British Protestant Cemetery, Madrid.

Mr. AYSHFORD WISE expressed an opinion that the Vote required some explanation, inasmuch as the conditions disclosed in the last published correspondence, as those upon which alone the Spanish Government would consent to this cemetery being established, were most unsatisfactory, and had been justly described as wholly inconsistent with the liberal spirit of the age. He thought, also, if no further correspondence had taken place, that the arrangement would lay the foundation for misunderstanding, and would tend to embroil us with the Spanish people. What were the facts? In 1851, the Marquis de Miraflores, and in 1853, General Lersundi, granted permission for the construction, at the place known by the name of La Herradura, at a short distance from the hill of San Damaso, of a cemetery for Protestant British subjects, who might die at Madrid, under the following conditions—

1. "The cemetery to be constructed with subjection to the sanitary rules required.
2. "No church, chapel, nor any other sign of a temple, or of public or private worship, will be allowed.
3. "All acts which could give any indication of the performance of any divine service whatsoever were prohibited.

On this proposal being submitted to the noble Viscount, then Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, that noble Lord very properly expressed his regret that the permission was accompanied by conditions so indicative of a system of religious intolerance on the part of the Spanish Government towards those who professed the Protestant religion, which formed so striking and unfavourable a contrast with the liberal and enlightened system of perfect religious freedom which prevailed in the United Kingdom towards the professors of the Roman Catholic faith. This took place in 1851, and nothing more was done until May, 1853, when he found that very strong language was used by Lord Howden, the British Minister at Madrid. His Lordship, in a despatch dated May 30, 1853, said, that the fourth condition was a seed of future difficulty, and that it opened a source of much possible conflict between the Legation and General Lersundi's department, and concluded with these words—"Perhaps I shall have occasion to try this question." Under such circumstances, he (Mr. Wise) considered it somewhat injudicious to establish a cemetery that had been opposed and delayed so long, and that even now was permitted to be inclosed on such unusual conditions. It appeared that this question had been more or less before the public for nearly half a century, and as long ago as the year 1796 a piece of land, intended to be appropriated for cemetery purposes, had been purchased by the Marquess of Bute. He held in his hand an original document belonging to the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone, which was of some interest, and with the permission of the Committee he would read it. It was from Lord Bute to Lord Grenville, and dated Madrid, 21st October, 1796—

"Mr Lord,—Having succeeded in purchasing a piece of ground under your Lordship's authority and the permission of the Prince de la Paz, to be converted into a burying-ground for Protestants, I requested of the Prince to favour me with some assurance that it might, notwithstanding the war, be considered as still appropriated to that purpose, and I now inclose his answer, which is very satisfactory. I at the same time beg to apprise you, that I have drawn a bill upon your Lordship, payable to Messrs. Coutts, for the amount, being 95*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.*"

Land, it appeared, had not risen in value at and near Madrid, for in 1846 the noble Viscount below had sanctioned the exchange of this land with the widow of Don Maroto, for some land of equal value, and of the same size, two acres and a quarter, or three Spanish fanegas, at 30*l.* a fanega. Now according to the estimate, all that had to be done was to build a gateway, and to erect a wall round this cemetery, and he could not see why Parliament should be called upon to vote so large a sum as 1,400*l.* for such a purpose. Lord Palmerston, in 1850, had asked for a return of the number of British subjects who had died within a given period at Madrid, and had pointed out to Lord Howden that upon the facts disclosed by that return must depend the question as to whether the Government would be justified in expending any very large sum of money in establishing a cemetery there. Lord Howden at that time, in answer to Lord Pal-merston's request, had stated, on the authority of Mr. Otway, that the number of British subjects who had died at Madrid from the year 1834 had been only from fifteen to twenty—not more than one a year. And it appeared that, in some cases at least, the interments had been permitted to take place in the Catholic cemeteries. He could not understand why all the Protestant powers—America, and Prussia, and Holland, and other Protestant States, whose subjects came, as well as those of Great Britain, to Madrid—should not support unitedly an object of this kind. Nor could he conceive that it was necessary to have sent out a man of Mr. Albano's reputation and experience as an architect to superintend so trifling a matter as the erection of a wall round a cemetery. That such a course should have been taken, seemed to him to show an itching to expend the public money; and as charges of this description were continually increasing upon the Estimates, he had thought it right to direct attention to the subject, and to ask the Committee to consider whether there was really any necessity for this arrangement. Very few English visited Spain, and still fewer Madrid, and from what he knew he was not surprised, as it had been well said that travellers went there to stare and to starve, and to be eaten and not to eat. Paris was visited by thousands, and there was no cemetery there for the English. There was no likelihood of their countrymen going to a city of which an adage said that the climate was three months of winter and nine of hell; and he really thought this Vote was one more of sentiment than necessity. The Committee should not forget how the Votes of this class were increasing. From 4,000*l.* in 1844, we had crept up now to 7,500*l.*; and, including the Votes for Constantinople, Madrid, and the chaplains attached to embassies, this department cost us for the year 1844 no less than 12,285*l.*!

MR. APSLEY PELLATT said, he wished to know whether the land was intended to be consecrated by a bishop of the Church of England? whether the chaplain of the embassy was to be the minister there? whether the bodies of Dissenters would be received there for interment? and whether this would extend to the child of a Baptist, who might not have received even lay baptism?

MR. J. WILSON said, since the date of the correspondence to which the hon. Member (Mr. A. Wise) had referred, Lord

Howden had succeeded in obtaining terms which were considered extremely satisfactory, and in removing all the obstacles which had been thought to stand in the way of adopting the earlier proposition. The hon. Gentleman would recollect that about a year ago there was a perfect fever of indignation upon the subject, and that the strongest possible feeling ran through the metropolitan press and the press of the country generally with respect to the way in which Protestants were treated by the Spanish Government, in reference to their burial-ground. The public were especially shocked by a statement that the body of an Englishman had been dug up for the purpose of robbing it of the clothes and other articles of trifling value which were upon it. And it was under the pressure of these circumstances, and of the strong feeling of indignation which was excited by them, that a renewed effort had been made, which had resulted, as he had said, in the obtaining of terms which were considered satisfactory, and in securing a piece of land in the only place in the neighbourhood of the city of Madrid in which it could have been procured for such a purpose. The Consul General upon the spot had endeavoured to induce the British residents to subscribe some portion of the expense; but they were few in number, and in a comparatively humble position in life, and it would therefore have been utterly impracticable to obtain from them any considerable sum. It therefore became a question whether the British Government should not take steps to remove the flagrant abuse which had been made a matter of charge against every person concerned in the administration of British affairs in Spain. The Government had felt it its duty to take such steps, and to take advantage of the opportunity which had presented itself for putting an end to this state of things; and the proposition which had been submitted to the Treasury, for inclosing the ground and adapting it to its intended purpose, had been forwarded by them to the Board of Works, the Chief Commissioner of which, his right hon. Friend near him, would, he was sure, give an explanation with respect to the way in which it could be carried out, which ought, he considered, to be satisfactory to the Committee.

MR. APSLEY PELLATT: As to the consecration?

MR. J. WILSON said, the cemetery would be consecrated by a Protestant bishop, and arrangements had been made by which it would be open to all British subjects.

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH said, the plans submitted to the Board of Works by the Treasury were so unsatisfactory, and the estimates were so uncertain, that he was persuaded that the cheapest and the most efficient mode of having the works executed was to send out a competent person to superintend them. He had arranged with Mr. Albano that he should go to Madrid, superintend the work, and return for a sum not exceeding 300*l.*; and he thought this a much better plan than trusting to native agency.

(3.) 2,500*l.*, Royal Monuments, Westminster Abbey.

MR. EWART said, that he highly approved of the object of the Vote. He believed that the monuments of Edward the Confessor, of Edward I., of Philippa, and Eleanor of Castille, would be exceedingly well restored. But he hoped the Government would take steps to secure the free admission of the public to these monuments, which were to be restored by their money. The fees taken in Westminster Abbey had been reduced from a discriminating duty to a fixed duty of 6*d.* each person. The plea for taking this fee was, that it went towards the payment of the persons who showed the monuments. St. Paul's was still worse than Westminster Abbey. He thought the Government should not lose the present opportunity of securing free access for the public to see the monuments which were repaired at their cost.

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH said, he had already directed his attention to the subject, and had inquired why any fee was taken; and he had been told that its object was to provide for the payment of the persons who were employed in showing the monuments. It was important that no person should be permitted to go round without being attended by people by whom they might be carefully watched, the fact being that the monuments had suffered much more from the petty pilferings of the last century than during the whole of the centuries preceding from decay. Mr. Scott, in his able Report, referred to the subject in the following terms—

“As the monuments have suffered fully as much from spoliation as from decay, it is of the utmost importance that the vigilant watch kept over them should not in any degree be relaxed. Had the present system been adopted a century earlier, the atrocious pilfering and robbery, from which those invaluable works of art have so grievously suffered, would have been in great measure prevented; for it is truly mortifying to reflect that, though the church was exposed during the great rebellion to the insults of the soldiery, who were at one time quartered within its walls, and though there was actually an order of Parliament (happily never obeyed) for melting down the bronze, these monuments actually suffered infinitely less during that turbulent time, than in the enlightened period intervening between the middle of the last century and our own day, and that their greatest spoliation has been suffered at the hands of that intelligent public, who, one would have imagined, would have been the guardians, rather than the pilferers, of our national monuments.”

If, therefore, no fee were to be levied on the public for viewing these monuments, it would be necessary that Parliament should vote a sum of money for the payment of persons to show them. If Parliament were prepared to do that, he would ask the consent of the Lords of the Treasury to such a Vote being proposed; and he had no doubt that if a general feeling in its favour were expressed, the Lords of the Treasury would acquiesce in it. He hoped, however, that if this were to be done, hon. Gentlemen would bear it in mind hereafter, because, generally speaking, when Estimates of this kind were proposed, he found himself turned round upon and charged with increasing the Estimates, and told that these were matters which the individuals, and not the public, ought to pay for.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, he was very glad to perceive that the general feeling of the Committee went with the Report, which was in his opinion drawn up with great skill and judgment. He was afraid, however, that his hon. Friend (Mr. Ewart) would be disappointed if he thought that for the sum of 2,500*l.* all the monuments in the Abbey would be restored to their pristine state. Neither did he (Mr. M. Milnes) think it desirable that they should be restored to that state. And what he most admired in the Report was the clear line which Mr. Scott had drawn between an intelligent preservation and a mere attempt at renewal. The claim of Westminster Abbey upon Parliament rested above all upon the fact of its being the mausoleum of their great men. When the poet Campbell died some years ago—that poet who wrote “The Mariners of England,” which was so applicable to the fleet in the Baltic—his remains were accompanied to the grave by a pompous funeral procession. The Earl of Aberdeen was one of the pall-bearers, and men high in station did honour to the dead. A statue was afterwards raised by public subscription—a statue quite worthy of the man. Why had it not been placed in the abbey? Why, simply because the Dean and Chapter of Westminster asked the enormous fee of 200*l.* for a few square feet of space. If the Dean and Chapter did not provide places for public statues, it could not be the interest or the duty of Parliament to spend the national money in the preservation or restoration of the building. He did hope that the Government would interfere in the matter, and that the result would be that this great scandal would be removed. As a Churchman, he felt that things of that kind did much to injure the higher order of the clergy.

MR. J. BALL said, he believed that amongst competent judges who had considered the subject, there were very great doubts as to the expediency of adopting all the recommendations of Mr. Scott. Some months ago several members of the Archaeological Society, on the invitation of Mr. Scott, examined many of the objects, and they were unanimously of opinion that many of the changes which Mr. Scott proposed were not desirable, either in an historical or in an artistic point of view. In particular these gentlemen thought that historical monuments like those would lose a great part of their interest if to any great extent old portions were taken away, and new ones substituted for them. He hoped, therefore, the Government would give an assurance that great caution would be exercised in the matter.

MR. BRADY said, it was melancholy to see such a splendid structure as Westminster Abbey decaying day by day, and he thought the Dean and Chapter greatly to be blamed for allowing it. He doubted whether money was well bestowed on monuments the erection of which had defaced and been almost the means of destroying the appearance of the beautiful architecture of the interior of the abbey. He objected to the erection of statues in ecclesiastical buildings, although he thought a proper place should be provided in which the country should do honour to those who had served it well. It was a disgrace that the people were not permitted to go freely through this building, and he hoped that the right hon. Baronet (Sir W. Molesworth) would endeavour to make some arrangement with the Dean and Chapter to effect that object, failing which he considered he would be justified in coming down to the House and asking for a Vote for the purpose.

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH said, he wished to remind hon. Members that the greater part of the abbey, namely, the nave, the choir, and the transept, were already open to the public without any charge; and the only reason why the rest was not placed in the same position was that which he had stated, namely, that it was necessary to prevent them from being pilfered. If the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. J. Ball) would read the Report carefully, he would see that the only object of Mr. Scott was to prevent the monuments from receiving injury from the process of decay which was continually going on. With regard to the matter referred to by the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. M. Milnes)—the monument to the poet Campbell—all he could say was, that he would immediately enter into communication on the subject with the Dean and Chapter of Westminster, and he had no doubt that when he had stated to them the wish of the House, they would be willing to comply with it.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he hoped that any money voted would be appropriated to the preservation of the monuments or the payment of persons to take care of them, and would not go into the pockets of the Dean and Chapter.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he felt called upon to complain of the violent attack made in the Report on the public, by attributing the mutilation of the monuments to their pilfering. He thought, if confidence were shown in the public, it would not be violated, as instanced in the case of the Great Exhibition of 1851, and other cases. It was an entire mistake to suppose, if they allowed the people to go into places in which were works of art, they ought to be watched like a parcel of pickpockets. He thought, if the Dean and Chapter considered it was so great a responsibility to protect the monuments committed to their charge, it would be well to withdraw that responsibility from their hands and vest it in the Government, when the public might be freely admitted.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) 1,000*l.*, Statue of King Charles I., Charing Cross.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he should like to know how it came that so large a sum was required?

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH said, he had to state, in reply to his hon. Friend's question, that last year, an application having been made to him by the Crystal Palace Company to allow a cast of the statue to be made, and that application having been acceded to, he had an opportunity of visiting the statue and observing certain defects in it. In consequence of what he saw he employed Mr. Richard Westmacott to examine the statue and make a report. That gentleman reported that it was in a very bad state. He stated that the horse was fractured in the knees—that the bridle, sword, and bit, were no more—that the tail was also defective, the weather having penetrated it. In short, he (Sir W. Molesworth) found that the statue could not be completely restored for less than the sum now asked for; it was evidently in a very dilapidated state, and unless the Committee were willing to see one of the finest statues in the metropolis fall to pieces, they should agree to the Vote.

Mr. AYSHFORD WISE said, he did not know why the Committee should be so particularly anxious to restore the statue of a King who was more celebrated for his violation of public rights than the enhancement of national liberties. He, however, acknowledged that it was a masterpiece of art, and believed it was the first equestrian statue ever raised in this country. It was, in fact, one of Le Sueur's masterpieces, and considerable interest was attached to the statue from the fact that it was sold by Parliament to a brazier, with orders to break it in pieces. The brazier, however, hid it carefully away, and sold some old pieces of bronze to the enthusiastic cavaliers of the day at high prices. The Earl of Portland, after the Restoration, discovered it, and ordered its re-erection. He (Mr. Wise) had considerable doubt whether a new pedestal would look well, and harmonise with the statue. The present pedestal was the work of Grinling Gibbon, and at all events was not in such a ruinous state as mentioned by the First Commissioner. He sympathised much with the Votes for the restoration of the monument of King Edward the Confessor, King Edward the Third, and Queen Elizabeth; but to this Vote he could only assent as a lover of the arts. On that ground he should be glad to see it restored, but he considered the sum of 1,000*l.* too large to be devoted to that purpose.

Mr. DISRAELI: Sir, I rather wonder that the hon. Member, as a lover of the arts, does not feel more regard for the memory of Charles I. Whatever may have been the constitutional predilections or prejudices of that Monarch, we are certainly indebted to him for something more than the statue which the right hon. Gentleman wisely advises us to preserve. Let me recall to the remembrance of the Committee that the statue once disappeared in consequence—not of a Vote—of the temper of the House of Commons, and was lost for a considerable period. When lost, it was universally agreed that the finest model of equestrian sculpture known in modern times was lost to the country. I think, after all that occurred in Parliament at that time—having regained this chef-d'œuvre of Le Sueur—it would not become the Committee, by its refusal of such a Vote, to endanger the permanent preservation of such a work of art.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) 13,000*l.*, Agricultural Statistics.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM said, he wished to know in what counties the collection of statistics had been made?

Mr. CARDWELL said, Norfolk, Suffolk, Hampshire, Hertfordshire, Buckinghamshire, Bedfordshire, and the West Riding of Yorkshire.

Mr. CAYLEY said, he wished to know why the survey was not to extend to the other counties of England?

Mr. CARDWELL said, the experiment would next year be made in eleven counties, some of them very large counties. When the experiment was first made, great difficulties were experienced; but those difficulties had been removed by judicious conduct. The Government, however, did not think it proper to ask a Vote for the whole kingdom until it had made an extended trial of the plan.

Mr. EVELYN DENISON asked, whether it was intended in the English returns to give the estimated produce, as in Scotland?

Mr. CARDWELL said, from the first it had been determined to keep matters of fact, such as the quantity of stock, acreage, &c., distinct from matters of opinion, such as estimates of produce. In the Scotch returns, both matters of fact and of opinion were stated, and he was informed that those opinions had been generally regarded as correct and satisfactory. In England, where the experiment was surrounded by greater difficulty, it was intended that those inspectors who opened new grounds should confine themselves to matters of fact, but that Sir John Walsham and Mr. Hawley, in the counties with which they already had been connected, should refer to matters of opinion as well as to matters of fact.

Mr. CAYLEY said, it would be satisfactory if the right hon. Gentleman would state (what he believed to be the fact) that the agriculturists had interposed no obstacle to the collection of these statistics.

Mr. CARDWELL said, it would be unfair to make any representations, on the whole, unfavourable to the intelligence of the agricultural interests; but, at the same time, it would not be true to say that there had not been at first any prejudices or opposition. More enlightened views, however, had prevailed (principally through the influence of men like Lord Ashburton), and there was every reason to believe that the work would ultimately be accomplished.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he hoped that it was intended to continue estimating the quantity of corn grown in Ireland, for although it was only an approximation, it had been productive of much good. He approved of the system under which the statistics had been collected, but thought it expedient they should be collected as early as possible. Last year some were collected as late as October.

(6.) 6,000*l.*, Spurn Point, River Humber.

LORD HOTHAM said, this Vote was for repairing a breach of the sea, and he must complain that the evil had been much increased in magnitude in consequence of the difficulty of communicating with the Government agent in a distant part of the country. The work was now being attended to, and its progress was satisfactory. He hoped in case of a similar disaster somebody would be there who had authority to give immediate orders.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, a question had arisen between the Trinity Board and the Admiralty on the subject, but after full consideration they had come to the conclusion that it would not be fair to insist on the Trinity Board paying for this matter. Attention had consequently been given to it, and it was now under the direction of the Admiralty officer of the Humber. He quite agreed with the noble Lord that this was a matter which required close and constant attention, and that that might be done a conservator of the river Humber had been appointed, who would act under the orders of the Admiralty. He would be desired to repair the breach, and to give his constant attention to the preservation of the coast, and to prevent a spread of the injury. The Committee would remember that they had voted large sums of money for harbours of refuge, but the Humber was a natural—and the only natural—harbour for a long distance upon the coast. He could assure the noble Lord that he would give the subject all the attention in his power.

(7.) 13,370*l.*, Kingstown Harbour.

Mr. J. WILSON said, he had now to propose a Vote for the repairs of Kingstown Harbour. Since the subject was last before the House inquiry had been made, and, upon the report of Mr. Rendel, the works were suspended for a short time; but they would shortly proceed, and he trusted to the satisfaction of every one.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he wished to know whether any alteration in the original plan, with regard to the depth of water, was likely to be adopted, in conformity with the suggestion he had made.

Mr. J. WILSON said, that the plan likely to be adopted, differed from the original design in this respect. Mr. Rendel had suggested that the harbour ought to be larger, so that steamers might arrive at all times of the tide, and the mail-bags and passengers be removed immediately to the railway train.

Mr. W. WILLIAMS wished to know whether the Vote was to be a final one?

Mr. J. WILSON said; it was for one year. An estimate of the total cost of the works had been prepared.

(8.) 16,889*l.*, Duchy of Cornwall Office.

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH said, that on moving the third reading of the Bill relating to this matter he had promised to make an explanatory statement. The object of this Vote was to provide a new office in Pimlico for the Duchy of Cornwall in exchange for the old office in Somerset House. The Duchy of Cornwall possessed offices, or rather he might describe it as a house, in Somerset House. There were two basement floors, in which the valuable records of the Duchy of Cornwall were placed, and there were four upper stories, which were used as the office of the Duchy of Cornwall and the rooms of the secretary. By the Act 15 Geo. III. c. 33, a part of Somerset House was vested in the King for the use of the office of the Duchy of Cornwall, and for other offices. The offices now occupied by the Duchy of Cornwall were very much wanted by the Inland Revenue Department. One branch of the Inland Revenue, the Excise, had hitherto been carried on at an office in the City, and the other at Somerset House, and it was considered expedient that both should be united. The office in the City was sold, and this branch was brought to Somerset House, where new buildings were in course of erection for the Inland Revenue office. However, great inconvenience was felt from the want of sufficient space, and this was more particularly felt since the Succession Tax had added considerably to the duties of that department. He had accordingly been directed to put himself in communication with the Council on the subject. They stated, however, that they were very well satisfied, and did not wish to part with their office in Somerset House, but for the convenience of the public service they consented to give up Somerset House on condition that they were furnished with an office as good, as valuable, as well situated, and to which they had as good a title as to their office in Somerset House. He thought these conditions only fair and reasonable, and he then took steps to procure a house for them. The first place to which he had directed his attention was Buckingham House, Pall Mall, but he found that in the first instance 30,000*l.* was demanded, and that 4,500*l.* would be required in addition to put it in order for the accommodation of the Duchy of Cornwall office. This sum was, he thought, much too large; it was double the amount of the present Vote. He had then proposed the Irish office in the Birdcage Walk, but on inquiries he found it impossible to obtain the fee simple of that building. It was then proposed to build a new office on the site of the new street at Pimlico. He was anxious that the houses in this street should consist of a new and better class of buildings, as being likely to return ultimately a larger amount of ground-rents to the Crown, and he thought that the best mode of beginning would be by building a new office for the Duchy of Cornwall at the extremity of the street, near the entrance to St. James's Park at Buckingham Palace end, and the Council of the Duchy of Cornwall agreed to accept this site, and plans for the new office were prepared and agreed to. But then arose the question of the comparative value of the two sites, and estimates were made on the part of the Board of Works and the Duchy of Cornwall respectively. The Board of Works argued that as the new office would be of more value than the old office in Somerset House, the Duchy of Cornwall ought to pay a portion of the expense. But the officers of the Duchy of Cornwall contended, on the other hand, that, as they had no desire to change, as they were very comfortable where they were, and only consented to vacate their present offices for the public convenience, it was not fair to call upon them to pay any portion of the expense. He could not deny that there was much force in this argument, and the following arrangement had at last been come to:—Two valuers were to be appointed—one by the Board of Works, the other by the Duchy of Cornwall—with power to the valuers to select an umpire; these valuers to have power to determine the difference between the value of the old office at Somerset House and the new office at Pimlico. If the value of the old office was greater than that of the new, Government was not to be called upon to pay anything to the Duchy of Cornwall. If, on the other hand, the value of the new office was greater than the old, the Duchy of Cornwall was only to be called on to pay the half of that difference, the other half being remitted in consideration of the accommodation that their removal would afford to the public. It was further stated that the officers of the Duchy of Cornwall had consented to remove immediately, though the new office would not be complete in less than two years. According to the estimate made by the officer of the Board of Works, the difference between the value of the two offices was 4,000*l.*, to be paid by the Duchy of Cornwall, of which, if the estimate were adopted, 2,000*l.* would be paid by the Duchy of Cornwall to the Consolidated Fund for the increased value of the new Vote, and the other 2,000*l.* would be given up as an accommodation to the Duchy of Cornwall for giving up an office which they had no desire to leave, and to which they were as much entitled as any hon. Member was to his town house. This was the estimate of the Board of Works, but the Duchy of Cornwall had come to a different estimate, and one in which no payment was to be made on their part. If the Vote were not agreed to, the Duchy of Cornwall would be very well content to remain in their present office in Somerset House, but the result would be very inconvenient to the public service.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he saw no necessity for this outlay at the present time. The Irish office had been removed from the house in Birdcage Walk, and, that being unoccupied, the right hon. Baronet ought to have removed the Duchy of Cornwall to that office. [Sir W. MOLESWORTH: But they won't go.] The House had lately voted 467,000*l.*, including, he supposed, the surplus from the late Exhibition, for the purchase of ground for public buildings. Surely a place could be found at Kensington Gore for the Duchy of Cornwall; or there was a space behind Somerset House leading to Waterloo Bridge which was available for the same purpose.

MR. DISRAELI said, the hon. Member for Lambeth was constantly harping upon the Vote of 500,000*l.* for the sites of Kensington Gore and Burlington House, but he seemed to forget that 150,000*l.* of that money was no part of the public grant, but was a munificent contribution from the surplus proceeds of the Crystal Palace. The House had voted 200,000*l.* for the purchase of land at Kensington Gore, but that was not for the purpose of public buildings, nor was the 125,000*l.* voted for Burlington House, inasmuch as it was purchased for the sake of the site, and it was generally contemplated that the present edifice would be pulled down. And then the hon. Gentleman said that the House having given near 500,000*l.* for public buildings, ought to be able to find accommodation for the office of the Duchy of Cornwall. He could not understand by what process of logic the hon. Gentleman arrived at this inference. Whether it was right to purchase the area which the country had obtained at Kensington Gore by means of the 150,000*l.* surplus of the Crystal Palace, was a question for that House to discuss, but it was impossible in these plots of land to find any equivalent for the house they were taking away from the Duchy of Cornwall. If they were turned out of Somerset House, the country was bound to find them another office. The arrangement proposed by the right hon. Baronet seemed to him very wise and politic, and, upon the whole, an economical arrangement, and he should support the Vote.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he must explain, that he was perfectly aware that the sum of 467,000*l.* recently laid out in the purchase of land included the 150,000*l.* surplus of the Crystal Palace, which had not been voted by Parliament.

MR. AYSHFORD WISE doubted extremely whether the Duke of Cornwall had in reality any vested interest in Somerset House. If at any time questions were asked in that House upon the subject of the Duchy revenues, they were told it was a private matter, with which that House had no more to do than with the rent-roll of the Duke of Northumberland, or the Marquess of Westminster. If that House, then, had no control over Duchy property, he should like to know what right the Duchy had to a public office for which they paid no rent? With a revenue of 57,000*l.*, and salaries at this moment of 13,000*l.* a year, he thought the Duchy were not justified in asking for a Vote of this kind—one which benefited persons who assumed, when it was convenient, that they were private individuals. Before the Committee consented to this Vote, he wished to state a few facts with reference to this vested right, for the more he had investigated the case, the more disposed he had been to oppose the Vote. In 1761, George III. purchased Buckingham House of Sir Charles Sheffield for 21,000*l.* Old Somerset Palace then belonged to the Crown, and was usually the residence of the Queen Dowagers. The Crown, on being paid 100,000*l.*, gave up Somerset Palace, and it was shortly after pulled down and the present house erected by Chambers, between 1776 and 1786. The rooms were converted into offices for the Navy Stamps, Inland Revenue, and other departments, and apartments were allotted to the Duchies of Lancaster and Cornwall. Now the Act confirming this arrangement was of a very singular character, and several of the clauses were repealed five years afterwards, as contrary to the usage of Parliament, the Acts respectively being 15 Geo. III. c. 33, and 20 Geo. III. c. 40. Lord Coke had well called the Duchy "a great mystery," and there certainly appeared something mysterious about this vested interest. The proposition before the Committee was, to give up a few rooms in Somerset House, and to vote 16,889*l.* for a new office in Pimlico. The new premises were to be valued against the old, and half the excess to be paid by the nation. If there were any vested interest, and the Government wanted these apartments for the Inland Revenue service, he thought the most desirable course would be to purchase the interest of the Duchy, and not embark in an expenditure without limit or any guarantee that the outlay would not exceed the amount of this Vote. It was said that MR. J. WILSON said, the architect was not the same gentleman who superintended the erection of the embassy house. The arrangements then were very imperfect, as that gentleman was not responsible to any one on the spot.

(2.) 1,400*l.*, British Protestant Cemetery, Madrid.

MR. AYSHFORD WISE expressed an opinion that the Vote required some explanation, inasmuch as the conditions disclosed in the last published correspondence, as those upon which alone the Spanish Government would consent to this cemetery being established, were most unsatisfactory, and had been justly described as wholly inconsistent with the liberal spirit of the age. He thought, also, if no further correspondence had taken place, that the arrangement would lay the foundation for misunderstanding, and would tend to embroil us with the Spanish people. What were the facts? In 1851, the Marquis de Miraflores, and in 1853, General Lersundi, granted permission for the construction, at the place known by the name of La Herradura, at a short distance from the hill of San Damaso, of a cemetery for Protestant British subjects, who might die at Madrid, under the following conditions—

1. "The cemetery to be constructed with subjection to the sanitary rules required.
2. "No church, chapel, nor any other sign of a temple, or of public or private worship, will be allowed.
3. "All acts which could give any indication of the performance of any divine service whatsoever were prohibited.

On this proposal being submitted to the noble Viscount, then Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, that noble Lord very properly expressed his regret that the permission was accompanied by conditions so

Lordship, in a despatch dated May 30, 1853, said, that the fourth condition was a seed of future difficulty, and that it opened a source of much possible conflict between the Legation and General Lersundi's department, and concluded with these words—"Perhaps I shall have occasion to try this question." Under such circumstances, he (Mr. Wise) considered it somewhat injudicious to establish a cemetery that had been opposed and delayed so long, and that even now was permitted to be inclosed on such unusual conditions. It appeared that this question had been more or less before the public for nearly half a century, and as long ago as the year 1796 a piece of land, intended to be appropriated for cemetery purposes, had been purchased by the Marquess of Bute. He held in his hand an original document belonging to the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone, which was of some interest, and with the permission of the Committee he would read it. It was from Lord Bute to Lord Grenville, and dated Madrid, 21st October, 1796—

"MY LORD,—Having succeeded in purchasing a piece of ground under your Lordship's authority and the permission of the Prince de la Paz, to be converted into a burying-ground for Protestants, I requested of the Prince to favour me with some assurance that it might, notwithstanding the war, be considered as still appropriated to that purpose, and I now inclose his answer, which is very satisfactory. I at the same time beg to apprise you, that I have drawn a bill upon your Lordship, payable to Messrs. Coutts, for the amount, being 95*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.*"

Land, it appeared, had not risen in value at and near Madrid, for in 1846 the noble Viscount below had sanctioned the exchange of this land with the widow of Don Maroto, for some land of equal value, and of the same size, two acres and a quarter, or three Spanish fanegas, at 30*l.* a fanega. Now according to the estimate, all that had to be done was to build a gateway, and to erect a wall round this cemetery, and he could not see why Parliament should be called upon to vote so large a sum as 1,400*l.* for such a purpose. Lord Palmerston, in 1850, had asked for a return of the number of British subjects who had died within a given period at Madrid, and had pointed out to Lord Howden that upon the facts disclosed by that return must depend the question as to whether the Government would be justified in expending any very large sum of money in establishing a cemetery there. Lord Howden at that time, in answer to Lord Pal-

merston's request, had stated, on the authority of Mr. Otway, that the number of British subjects who had died at Madrid from the year 1834 had been only from fifteen to twenty—not more than one a year. And it appeared that, in some cases at least, the interments had been permitted to take place in the Catholic cemeteries. He could not understand why all the Protestant powers—America, and Prussia, and Holland, and other Protestant States, whose subjects came, as well as those of Great Britain, to Madrid—should not support unitedly an object of this kind. Nor could he conceive that it was necessary to have sent out a man of Mr. Albano's reputation and experience as an architect to superintend so trifling a matter as the erection of a wall round a cemetery. That such a course should have been taken, seemed to him to show an itching to expend the public money; and as charges of this description were continually increasing upon the Estimates, he had thought it right to direct attention to the subject, and to ask the Committee to consider whether there was really any necessity for this arrangement. Very few English visited Spain, and still fewer Madrid, and from what he knew he was not surprised, as it had been well said that travellers went there to stare and to starve, and to be eaten and not to eat. Paris was visited by thousands, and there was no cemetery there for the English. There was no likelihood of their countrymen going to a city of which an adage said that the climate was three months of winter and nine of hell; and he really thought this Vote was one more of sentiment than necessity. The Committee should not forget how the Votes of this class were increasing. From 4,000*l.* in 1844, we had crept up now to 7,500*l.*; and, including the Votes for Constantinople, Madrid, and the chaplains attached to embassies, this department cost us for the year 1844 no less than 12,285*l.*!

MR. APSLEY PELLATT said, he wished to know whether the land was intended to be consecrated by a bishop of the Church of England? whether the chaplain of the embassy was to be the minister there? whether the bodies of Dissenters would be received there for interment? and whether this would extend to the child of a Baptist, who might not have received even lay baptism?

MR. J. WILSON said, since the date of the correspondence to which the hon. Member (Mr. A. Wise) had referred, Lord

Howden had succeeded in obtaining terms which were considered extremely satisfactory, and in removing all the obstacles which had been thought to stand in the way of adopting the earlier proposition. The hon. Gentleman would recollect that about a year ago there was a perfect fever of indignation upon the subject, and that the strongest possible feeling ran through the metropolitan press and the press of the country generally with respect to the way in which Protestants were treated by the Spanish Government, in reference to their burial-ground. The public were especially shocked by a statement that the body of an Englishman had been dug up for the purpose of robbing it of the clothes and other articles of trifling value which were upon it. And it was under the pressure of those circumstances, and of the strong feeling of indignation which was excited by them, that a renewed effort had been made, which had resulted, as he had said, in the obtaining of terms which were considered satisfactory, and in securing a piece of land in the only place in the neighbourhood of the city of Madrid in which it could have been procured for such a purpose. The Consul General upon the spot had endeavoured to induce the British residents to subscribe some portion of the expense; but they were few in number, and in a comparatively humble position in life, and it would therefore have been utterly impracticable to obtain from them any considerable sum. It therefore became a question whether the British Government should not take steps to remove the flagrant abuse which had been made a matter of charge against every person concerned in the administration of British affairs in Spain. The Government had felt it its duty to take such steps, and to take advantage of the opportunity which had presented itself for putting an end to this state of things; and the proposition which had been submitted to the Treasury, for inclosing the ground and adapting it to its intended purpose, had been forwarded by them to the Board of Works, the Chief Commissioner of his right hon. Friend near him, who was sure, give an explanation of the way in which it could be done, which ought, he considered, to be satisfactory to the Committee.

MR. APSLEY PELLATT asked, would the consecration?

MR. J. WILSON said, the land would be consecrated by a P a full, diligent, and searching inquiry, and presented a carefully drawn up Report. Would it be right that he should now anticipate the decision at which the Government might arrive after a careful perusal of the Report and evidence—of a Commission, too, constituted of most able and efficient men, and the result of whose labours had been but so short a time before Parliament. When it was fully considered, then the determination of Government would be known.

MR. BRIGHT said, he had had a representation made to him from an important meeting in Manchester with reference to this Vote. If Mr. Cole's, the town clerk's letter was looked over it would be seen that 50,000*l.* was asked for, and the purposes detailed. In Manchester there was a strong desire to have their manufactures fully represented in the Paris Exhibition, it being considered they were not fairly represented at the Great Exhibition in Hyde Park, in 1851. It was desired by the Manchester manufacturers to have no names or firms affixed to any exhibition of goods, but that goods should only have places, and not names, affixed. A subscription for this purpose had been entered into, and a large sum had already been raised. He had received a letter from a manufacturer in Manchester on the subject of the items of this Vote for 50,000*l.* The writer said it would appear from Mr. Cole's letter that very little of this sum was to be spent for the benefit of the exhibitors. Some of the items were these:—for dividing the spaces of the exhibitors, 3,700*l.*; cleaning and watching, 5,200*l.*; printing and advertising, 3,800*l.*; travelling expenses and jurors, 11,250*l.*; other expenses, 3,500*l.* The only items which really contemplated giving aid to exhibitors were—Carriage of goods, 2,750*l.*; general decorations, 2,000*l.* Therefore, out of the whole 50,000*l.* not more than 9,750*l.* could be called direct or indirect aid to the exhibition of goods of this country. He hoped the Committee would obtain some expression of opinion on the part of Government, to show that money would not be spent on mere official management, but in aiding the views and subscription of the Manchester manufacturers. Let the money be spent, the writer urged, not merely on matters of official show and glorification, but on really useful objects.

Mr. Cardwell

He could not say anything more to the purpose than what was contained in the letter. There was only 9,700*l.* to be applied to objects which directly served the great purpose of the Exhibition, while not less than 43,000*l.* was to go for other purposes. He would put it to the right hon. Gentleman to take care in voting this sum, that such items as 11,250*l.* for jurors, &c., should not be unprofitably spent. The general result of the jurors at the English Exhibition in 1851 was nearly nothing. Medals and honours were bestowed so generally and universally, that the value of a medal to a manufacturer became so small as not to be able to be calculated at all. He did not mean to say a word against the Committee. The gentleman at the head of the Committee displayed ability and enthusiasm in forwarding the objects of the Exhibition; but he was an official, and, like other officials, was disposed to magnify the office he held, and to concentrate his whole regards in that one object. The grant might, in this view, be devoted in a magnificent manner mainly to the glorification of the official staff, as had been the case in other instances. It was right to vote a sum of money for the Exhibition at Paris, as it would be of extreme advantage to have our manufactures properly represented in Paris, as then the French people might be inclined to think it would be to their advantage to take some of our manufactures as we had done by theirs. He thought 43,000*l.* for other objects than those directly of utility to the exhibitors was an excessive sum, and he hoped the Committee would look into the items.

MR. CARDWELL said, he was glad to hear the hon. Gentleman say we ought to make a suitable response to the French Government for what they did at our Exhibition in 1851. He admitted the Vote was large, and that it ought to be carefully scrutinised. With regard to his own department, it was its duty to take care that neither the Treasury nor that House should be under any delusion as to the application of the money. The hon. Gentleman said the Vote was so divided as to make more for the convenience and glorification of the official persons, than for the benefit of the exhibitors. The convenience of official persons amounted to this; that far greater responsibilities were thrown upon them, without any addition to their salary. With regard to the distribution of the sum, he was sorry the gentlemen of Manchester did not think the expenditure would operate sufficiently for their benefit. The hon. Gentleman divided the sum into two parts. In every case of this sort there must be two classes of expenditure; one in which direct benefit would be obvious to the exhibitors; the other, where the benefit would be as great though not as obvious. This last class of expenditure had reference to that which was everybody's business and nobody's business, and which, if not undertaken by others than the individuals themselves, would not be done at all, though absolutely necessary in order to enable exhibitors to secure the benefits of the Exhibition. The hon. Gentleman sneered at the division of the sum of money proposed to be voted; but if the amount was too large, according to the knowledge of the hon. Gentleman, then the hon. Gentleman's knowledge differed from his (Mr. Cardwell's) knowledge, which was on the information gained from the Exhibition of 1851. [Mr. BRIGHT: That Exhibition was a totally different thing.] It was not totally different. What the French Government did for us, the English Government proposed to do for the French exhibition. The expenditure would not be without due control—the expenditure would be under the control of the official authorities, and the items would be regularly submitted to the Board of Trade. With regard to the sum to be expended, the principle Government proceeded upon was, to call on Parliament to furnish that portion of the expenditure which could not be looked for from individuals. The expenditure would be much less than the expenditure of the French Government in 1851. As it was manifestly impossible at once accurately to state the amount of the actual expenses which would be incurred, this sum had been put down as being likely to be sufficient to cover everything which would be required; but, if it were possible to economise the expenditure, the hon. Gentleman might be assured that every effort would be used for that purpose. He might here take the opportunity of stating that the French Government had, with praiseworthy liberality, made arrangements for the admission and consumption in Paris of all articles otherwise prohibited by the French tariff on payment of a maximum duty of 20 per cent. He rejoiced to have to mention the circumstance at that time; for he thought it was only due to the French Government to make it known. It was not a matter of regular occurrence, but an experiment, and everything of course should be done to lessen the expense; and if the exhibition should increase the intercourse between the English and French people, he (Mr. Cardwell) should not regret that expenditure.

Mr. BRIGHT said, he had no desire to reduce the Vote by a single farthing, if it were considered necessary for the object in view; but he still thought that, while the really useful part of the expenditure was small, and he might even say stingy, that which was to be incurred for the cost of official management, for the staff of clerks, and for sending a great many persons to live luxuriously at Paris, was too large. The French Government were said to have spent 68,000*l.* on account of the Exhibition of 1851, but it must be remembered that there were not then associations of manufacturers and others at Lyons or Rouen, for instance, subscribing 3,000*l.* or 4,000*l.* for these expenses as there was in this country. If that had been the case, the French Government, in all probability, would not have had to spend so large a sum.

COLONEL SIBTHORP said, that he had always acted in conformity with one opinion with respect to what was called the Crystal Palace in this country. He entertained the same opinion with regard to Sydenham. He wished to ask the hon. Member for Manchester whether he had been at the Crystal Palace in Hyde Park? He (Colonel Sibthorp) had abstained from going there, fond as he was of articles of vertu, because he would not encourage foreign in preference to native industry. He had been brought up in that opinion. It might be vulgar; but he was an old John Bull, devoted to his country in every way that he could serve it—both in pocket and in person. He wanted to know whether the hon. Member for Manchester had shown his very valuable person in Hyde Park? He had not found him (Colonel Sibthorp) there, nor would he find him at Sydenham. He had never voted a shilling that was not for the benefit of his country. He would, therefore, again ask the hon. Member for Manchester whether he had been at the Crystal Palace in Hyde Park, and whether he meant to go to Sydenham.

Mr. BROTHERTON said, his constituents entertained the same opinions on the Vote as those of the hon. Member for Manchester. They did not object to the amount of the sum, but to its distribution.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he must complain, on the part of the people of Ireland, that the articles were only to be transported from London to a French port. He objected to the inadequate disproportion between the cost of transport and the cost of representation—it was the half-pennyworth of bread to the six gallons of sack. He hoped that something would be done for the transport of Irish manufactures from Ireland to France. There was no vote of public money in aid of the Irish Exhibition; and more assistance was got from abroad for that important national object than from this country. He did not object to the Vote; but he hoped Ireland would receive its due share of the expenditure.

MR. RICH said, that there did not appear to be any objection to the Vote, and, although there were some difficulties with regard to the appropriation of it, it would be satisfactory to the Committee if the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade would give some intimation as to what officer would have the control of the money voted, and whether any Member of the Government would be responsible for its expenditure.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he believed that if exhibitors had been left to themselves the whole affair would have been much better arranged than it would be if any charge were made upon the public funds. He could perceive that the general feeling of the Committee was in favour of this Vote, but he, for his own part, entirely objected to it. The report which had been referred to by the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright) appeared to him to be very absurd, for the greater part of the Vote would be eaten up in printing and other expenses, and in enabling a staff of jurors to pass a very agreeable time in Paris at the public expense.

MR. SPOONER said, there was some ground to ask a Vote for the transportation of goods to Paris, and for watching over their security there. But he did not know what we had to do with “the completion of the Exhibition and its general decoration.” He hoped the right hon. Gentleman opposite could give the House some explanation of the items which appeared in the Vote under these heads.

MR. CARDWELL said, that all that it was intended to do was precisely the same that had been done by the French Government in 1851. It was not intended to furnish exhibitors with cases, but, after all had been done by the exhibitors, it became necessary to do something still more. In the case of raw products, persons would not care to send them over for exhibition, but the Government would do so, and the expenses of the cases would be defrayed out of this item. With regard to general decoration, also, it was proposed only to do what had been done by the French Government in 1851, and he must say that, if the textile fabric of this country were to be exhibited, in his opinion it would not be advantageous to place it in a part of the building which, from its appearance, would be the part least likely to attract the French people.

COLONEL SIBTHORP said, the Government had encouraged foreigners to that degree, that no article could be sold for the ladies unless it was foreign. For durability, solidity, and beauty, there was nothing like the British manufactures. He was a real John Bull. He had no reliance upon the French. Beware of man-traps and spring-guns in Prussia and Austria. John Bull was a great fool; and he (Colonel Sibthorp) would not subscribe to any Vote for the foreigner unless it was stated to be for the good of the British public.

MR. LOCKE said, he did not intend to oppose the Vote, but he thought that if the manufacturing industry of this country had been left to itself, there would have been no necessity for it at all.

Vote agreed to.

(11.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding 100,000*l.*, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of Civil Contingencies, to the 31st day of March, 1855.”

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that many items paid under this head in the course of last year were very objectionable. He would not trouble the Committee with all of these objectionable matters, but only pick out some of the worst. He found that several amounts were set down for progresses made by West Indian bishops round their dioceses; he could not understand why these bishops did not pay the expense of these tours themselves. Again, for the clothing of the trumpeters of the Guards, a sum of 1,567*l.* was set down. That amount ought to have been in the Army Estimates, and then there would have been an opportunity of objecting to it. Another item was the payment to Lord Cranworth on his appointment as Lord Chancellor, 1,843*l.* Why this was paid he (Mr. Williams) could not conceive. A similar item was 2,000*l.* to Earl St. Germans, on his appointment as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and this was as inexplicable as the payment to Lord Cranworth. The objectionable items amounted in the whole to 10,000*l.* or 12,000*l.*, and they had no redress, for the Vote was for 100,000*l.*, which, no doubt, would be 20,000*l.* more than would be required, so that if he even induced the Committee to deduct the 10,000*l.* or 12,000*l.*, there would be sufficient remaining to defray all the charges.

MR. APSLEY PELLATT said, he wished to know upon what ground a sum for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the colonial bishops for making tours through their dioceses was placed upon the Votes? It appeared to him to be an entirely new charge upon the public funds.

MR. J. WILSON said, that for very many years the colonial bishops had been obliged to pay periodical visits to various portions of their dioceses. Several of these localities consisted of islands in the West Indies, and in passing to those districts they were usually afforded a passage in such of Her Majesty's ships as might happen to be at the particular station, and were merely allowed the expenses of their maintenance while on board the vessel. With respect to the sum paid to the Lord Chancellor upon his appointment, he could only say that a similar sum had been given to that officer from time immemorial; and he believed it was entirely inadequate to defray his expenses. To the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, also, who was a high officer of State, he did not think that an unreasonable sum was asked to be granted for the purpose of furnishing the equipage becoming his position.

MR. APSLEY PELLATT said, that, as he had received no sufficient answer with respect to the amount allowed to the colonial clergy for the purpose of enabling them to make a tour from one portion of their dioceses to another, he should move that that amount be deducted from the Vote.

Motion made, and Question proposed—

In reply to a question from Mr. VERNON SMITH,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the first result of Sir Stafford Northcote's service was, in conjunction with another person, a Report upon the Packet Estimates, which led to a great reduction of the expenditure of the public money. He wished that his right hon. Friend should have time to read all the blue books that were produced by Sir Stafford Northcote and other public officers, and in conclusion he begged to remark that Sir Stafford Northcote was not in possession of any other emoluments when, at the request of the Government, he consented to receive a salary for his services.

MR. MURROUGH said, that if they did not go to a division, the hon. Member for Southwark was only wasting the time of the Committee. He thought the hon. Member should have pressed the matter much more strongly than he had done.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, the allowance to the colonial bishops was so small that it did not allow them to pay the expenses of travelling to various parts of their dioceses, which in some cases included many of the West India Islands; and hitherto the practice had been to pay out of the public funds the expenses incurred by them. For example, the island of Bermuda was in the diocese of the Bishop of Newfoundland—a considerable distance. The journey would involve considerable expense, and the small salary of the bishop would hardly enable him to bear it.

MR. APSLEY PELLATT said, he would not divide upon the question if the hon. Under Secretary promised that the items would not be repeated next year.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he thought the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. W. Williams) had been himself cruising about the whole evening in a very unsatisfactory manner, and without coming to any result. After criticising several items, the hon. Member had concluded by doing nothing.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that whatever opinion the hon. Member might entertain of his conduct he regarded with perfect indifference. He had divided Committees on a great many items of wasteful expenditure, and he never succeeded yet in any division; and he, therefore, after pointing out what he conceived to be items of extravagance, thought it better to leave the matter rather to the Government than to the House of Commons.

MR. HADFIELD said, he must protest against these constant claims for colonial purposes connected with religion.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he felt called upon to complain of the astounding increase in the standing army and militia force this year as compared with previous years. In the year ending 31st March 1852, the standing army was 98,714. The number this year was 127,977. Then there was an increase in the artillery from 14,573 to 20,306. And here was an increase of 124,700 militia, yet only 30,000 had been sent to the East, an equal number to which had been withdrawn from Ireland and the colonies.

COLONEL SIBTHORP said, he thought it was evident the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. W. Williams) knew nothing of soldiering, and he should like to see the hon. Gentleman amongst the awkward squad of the regiment which he had the honour to command. He believed that nobody in the country would be more ready to cry out "wolf," if his property were in danger than that hon. Gentleman. He (Colonel Sibthorp) considered the war to be one which involved the law, religion, and liberties of this country, and it was the duty of every loyal subject cheerfully to bear his share of its necessary burdens.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he begged to ask the Secretary at War what arrangements had been made with respect to the clothing of the troops?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT replied that, with respect to the regiments of line, the contracts were for a year in advance. Consequently, there were contracts existing for the supply for 1855, and in some cases for 1856, in which no changes could take place, but the changes that would hereafter take place were under consideration. He had had specimens of cloth submitted to him, and hoped that he should be able, at the same time that the clothing was of a better description than heretofore, to effect a considerable saving in the outlay.

(14.) 10,000*l.* Retired Full Pay.

COLONEL LINDSAY said, he wished to know whether there would be any objection to granting to those officers who had retired on full pay—many of whom had done good service during the Peninsular war—the same boon that had been granted to those who might hereafter retire on full pay?

COLONEL DUNNE said, he begged to ask what was the intention of the Government with reference to the recommendations of the Commission? He considered the subject alluded to by the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Lindsay) worthy of consideration.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he could not avoid expressing his fears that justice had not been done towards the colonels of regiments in the compensation given to them in lieu of the emoluments they derived from clothing their men. When those emoluments were first given to them, they were required to give up certain pensions and other sources of income. However much the country might condemn the system of making colonels derive advantages from clothing their regiments, he was quite certain it would not be the public wish that men, many of whom were distinguished officers in the service, should be prejudiced in their income by any new arrangement it might be thought expedient to introduce.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that, with regard to the clothing of the army, he thought the alteration which had been introduced was quite necessary, and that the changes would be economical, not because the colonels of regiments would suffer from it, which he believed would not be the case, because his opinion was that the whole fault of the existing system was on the part of the clothiers, and not of the colonels. He very much doubted whether such a system could have existed for so long a period if there had been any malversation. He thought, however, the system to be most objectionable in principle, and therefore he proposed that it should be abolished. It was quite true that the officers did give up their good-conduct rewards, and that they were exposed to this inconvenience, that during the first year they held their regiment they got no emolument from the clothing, as that went to the executors of the predecessor. Under these circumstances, he had offered to the officers to pay them at once for the year, which he thought was only fair. Further than this, where the officer provided caps which would have been paid for by his successor, in that case he considered that the public should stand in the same position as the successor would have done, and should pay the value of one year or of two years, as the case might be; but in no case would the officer be entitled to more than 600*l.* a year. With respect to the question whether the recommendations of the Commission would be made law, he should say that they would be embodied in a warrant. He had been for some days employed in drawing up minutes on the subject, and had had a communication with the Commander in Chief respecting it, but he would not give any opinion upon it at present. He confessed that his knowledge of that House and the bad results with regard to promises was such that he did not think they could pledge themselves to make any measure have a retrospective action. However, he would promise that the subject should receive the fullest possible consideration.

Vote agreed to.

House resumed.

STAMP DUTIES BILL.

Order for Third Reading read.

MR. HADFIELD moved that the House adjourn.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that at that period of the Session it was usual to sit a little late, in order to accomplish the business of Parliament in anything like a reasonable period.

Motion made, and Question "That this House do now adjourn," put, and negatived.

Bill read 3^d.

On the Question that the Bill do pass,

MR. HADFIELD moved the addition of the following clause—

"And whereas doubts have arisen whether, under the provisions of the said Act of the 13th and 14th years of Her present Majesty, chapter 97, leases, whereby there is reserved a peppercorn or other nominal rent, are subject to the Stamp Duty of sixpence by the said Act imposed on leases where the rent shall not exceed five pounds, or to a Stamp of some other and greater amount, and it is expedient that the said doubts should be set at rest, Be it Enacted, That where, by any lease or tack of any lands, tenements, hereditaments, or heritable subjects, for any term of years, there shall be reserved the rent of a peppercorn, or any other nominal rent, such lease or tack shall, in respect of such nominal rent, only be subject to the said Stamp Duty of sixpence and no more."

MR. J. WILSON said, he must oppose the introduction of the clause.

Clause brought up, and read 1^o.

Motion made, and Question, "That the said Clause be now read a second time," put, and negatived.

MR. G. A. HAMILTON moved the clause of which Lord Naas had given notice—

"Stamp Duties now payable on Matriculations, Degrees, and Certificates of Degrees, in each and every University in the United Kingdom, shall be abolished so soon as provision shall have been made, to the satisfaction of the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, in lieu of any monies heretofore voted annually by Parliament for any of the said Universities."

He would remind the House that he had himself proposed a clause to the same effect, but applicable only to the University of Dublin. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had objected to that clause on the grounds that he (Mr. Hamilton) was showing favouritism to one University. He was not ashamed to acknowledge that he felt it his duty to attend particularly to the interests of the body whom he represented; but his noble Friend (Lord Naas) having given notice of a clause more general in its application, he was quite as ready to propose it. The case could be explained in a few words. The Commissioners for the three Universities had recommended the abolition of the stamp duties. The Commissioners for Cambridge state—

"These taxes on degrees and matriculations are levied only on the students and graduates of Oxford, Cambridge, and Dublin, and with the single exception of the M.D. degree of the Scotch Universities, upon which we are informed there is a stamp duty of 10*l*., there is, we believe, no similar tax upon students in any other University in the United Kingdom."

The Oxford Commissioners state—

"We are of opinion that the stamp duty now charged on matriculation and degrees, and the heavy tax of 10*l*. on the certificate of a degree, should be repealed. It seems anomalous that Government should take from a place of education not less than 2,400*l*. a year."

The Dublin University Commissioners state—

"Stamps on matriculation and degrees seem to us to violate the fundamental principles of taxation. In the first place, they bear no proportion to the means of the taxpayer; the parents of the sizar, or the sizar himself—exempt from the fees to the college on account of poverty—is taxed at the same rate as the parent of a fellow-commoner, who pays to the college double fees; in fact, they have all the evils of a poll tax. In the next place, they are imposed at the time when it is most inconvenient for the contributors. To any one with moderate means, who thinks it his duty to give his son a University education, or any hard-working student supporting himself by tuitions, the period of education is the one when money can least be spared; every pound is then of value."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer had objected to his (Mr. Hamilton's) clause, as if the remission of the stamps would be so much given to the University of Dublin, but it was nothing given to the University of Dublin. The tax was a student's tax, payable by students, not by the University. It was a tax upon education, and it placed the University of Dublin in an unfair position as compared with the Queen's University in Dublin, where there were no stamps payable upon matriculations or degrees.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he hoped the House would leave the Government to deal with the question, which was one of considerable complexity—and he was prepared to say that the Government would deal with it. These degrees divided themselves into two classes; the duties upon one of these classes he admitted, as stated by the hon. Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Hamilton), were taxes upon education; but the duties on the other class, such, for example, as the medical degrees, were duties upon a franchise, which opened the door to a lucrative profession; and if they remitted the duty upon the medical degree conferred by Universities, they must legislate in a similar manner with respect to the College of Physicians. There were also the Inns of Courts, and they must deal with the duty paid on admission to the degree or privileges of a barrister, and then they would have also to consider the claims of their old friends the attorneys. The stamp duties were not at present to be remitted at Oxford; as a condition for remitting them, Government would require from the University the endowment of certain professorships. He hoped, for these reasons, the hon. Member would be induced to trust the matter in the hands of the Government.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he thought that no case had been made against the proposition of the hon. Member (Mr. Hamilton), and he would support him on a division.

MR. G. A. HAMILTON said, he would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he would consent to remit the stamp duties now upon matriculations and degrees in arts? He believed he might be allowed to say that the board of Trinity College were about, of their own accord, to endow certain open scholarships, which ought to entitle them to the same remission as Oxford.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, the Government had at present no official knowledge of this, and it would be necessary to see in what manner these scholarships were to be arranged; but the subject should be dealt with by Government.

MR. G. A. HAMILTON said, that under these circumstances he would not press his clause to a division.

Mr. G. A. Hamilton

Clause brought up, and read 1°.

Motion made, and Question, "That the said Clause be now read a second time," put, and negatived.

MR. HADFIELD said, he knew that he rose under great disadvantages at such an hour (half-past one), when the Treasury bench was the only bench that contained any considerable portion of occupants. However he would beg to move another Amendment of which he had given notice.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the second column in page 13, under the title "Duties," beginning at the words "if the term shall exceed 100 years," and ending with the figures "3*l.* 0*s.* 0*d.*"

MR. J. WILSON said, he must decline to argue the question, since it had already been decided by the House.

The House divided:—Ayes 74; Noes 8: Majority 66.

Other Amendments made.

Bill passed.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND) BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. MAGUIRE said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland ought not, at that hour of the morning (ten minutes to two o'clock), to persevere with a Bill which he really did think, under the present circumstances of Ireland, involved both an insult and an outrage.

SIR JOHN YOUNG said, the Bill was simply directed against the Ribbon lodges and secret societies in those counties in Ireland where they existed. When they looked at the operation of these societies in the county of Monaghan, and in part of Armagh, some repressive law must be considered as absolutely necessary. It was impossible to exaggerate the evils which the system of terrorism, as it prevailed there, produced, and no Government could safely dispense with the powers given them under this Act. The powers conferred upon the Government by this Act were simply these:—In case atrocious crimes were frequent and numerous in any district, the Lord Lieutenant had power to proclaim that district, and to station there a certain number of constabulary, which formed a charge upon the district. The main power, however, was the restriction placed upon the possession of arms. Any person who wished to possess arms must come forward and ask for a licence to have them in his house; but this licence was never refused unless a satisfactory reason could be assigned, publicly and in open court, why the applicant should not be allowed to have it.

MR. MITCHELL said, that he had been told by the late Mr. Bateson that he had received thirty-eight notices, and in the place he (Mr. Mitchell) lived in the north of Ireland, a gentleman was unable to leave his house because he employed an agent denounced by one of these Ribbon societies. He should support the Bill.

MR. R. M. FOX said, that as nothing had been shown to implicate the whole of Ireland in the offences which the Bill was intended to meet, he should move that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."

MR. MAGUIRE said, that while expressing his abhorrence of such few wretches as had been described, he must assert that the state of Ireland generally did not justify the passing of the Bill—being peaceful, loyal, and obedient to the law, as a general rule.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he did not approve of this kind of legislation two years ago, and therefore he could not be supposed to agree to it now when Ireland was so much improved, with the exception of the limited districts in Monaghan and Armagh. The Bill was now said to be to put down Ribbonism, which was entirely confined to the north, there being none in Munster and Connaught, and therefore the Bill ought to be limited to that part of the country.

MR. MACARTNEY said, that none but Roman Catholics were affiliated in these societies, and he hoped it would not be supposed these crimes originated with the Protestants of the south of Ireland,

The House divided:—Ayes 50; Noes 11: Majority 39.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 2^o.

THE RIFF PIRATES.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE, in putting a question of which he had given notice on the subject of the Riff, to his noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, said, that our commerce on the highway of the Mediterranean had of late been much exposed to attack by a body of men known as the "Riff Pirates," who amounted in number, he believed, to 4,000 or 5,000, and who occupied a situation on the coast of Morocco, about 120 miles from Gibraltar. They lived under the immediate rule of their own chiefs or sheiks, but were tributaries or subjects of the Emperor of Morocco, and had lately become known as being most dangerous to the trade of all nations. The matter was of the more importance inasmuch as the position they occupied was on the direct highway of the commerce to the East and the Mediterranean, and it was of the highest importance that some measures should be taken to check their piratical proceedings. They were, he believed, first heard of in 1851, when they made a piratical attack on a vessel of this country, named the Violet, belonging to Wisbeach, which was treated in the manner customary with pirates, having been attacked and plundered, the master wounded, and the mate killed. The Government on that occasion sent a vessel of war to inquire into the circumstances, with a view to revenge the attack and bring away the plunder if possible. That vessel was received in a warlike manner, but it succeeded in bringing away the captured vessel; and he was not quite certain, but he believed she was obliged to return with her captain and some of her men wounded. That was in 1851; but as late as June or July last a vessel coming from Malta to England, named the Cuthbert Young, of Newcastle, was treated in the same manner, and the Prometheus was sent out to recover her, and to do what she could against the pirates; whether she succeeded or not he did not know, one statement being that she brought back the hull of the captured vessel, and another that she did not succeed; but, at all events, it was established that those pirates were ready for any sort of work, and committed great ravages. As the case now stood, he believed that the Government had only thought it necessary to deal with it by advertising traders to beware of that coast. But, having served in the Mediterranean many years of his life, he knew it was not very easy in passing through the Straits of Gibraltar to keep clear of it, as a current set in that direction, and vessels were driven on it whether they would or not; the consequence of which was, that it proved a capital trap for those men, giving them a position in which they could deal with the vessels as they liked. It did appear to him that something more was necessary to be done than the course taken by the Government of giving notice at Lloyd's that it was a dangerous coast; and he thought if the Government were not prepared to deal with those people by any measures of a warlike character, there should be at least a steam cruiser constantly there as a sentry for the protection of trade. The question which he wished to put to his noble Friend was, whether the Government intended to take any, and what, steps for the safety of trade with respect to these pirates?

THE EARL OF CLARENDON said, the subject had long occupied the attention of Her Majesty's Government. Four or five cases of piracy had happened since 1847, and applications had been made in the matter; but the difficulty of dealing with those men was, that they occupied a portion of the territory of the Emperor of Morocco, and were his subjects. In that state of affairs, an application had been made to the Emperor of Morocco to prevent the continuance of these depredations; but the Emperor professed his inability to do so, when Her Majesty's Government then informed him that they would undertake to do it irrespective of his assistance. In the case to which his noble Friend had alluded—that of the Cuthbert Young—the vessel which was ordered to look out for the pirates immediately went to the coast and recaptured the vessel, which was defended by the pirates, who were fired at and shelled, and there was reason to believe that they sustained considerable loss. The main difficulty of dealing with these people, however, appeared to be the necessity for a land force, and, with respect to that question there might be at this moment some delay; but he could assure his noble Friend that the attention of the Government had been directed to the subject, and there was a vessel now at Gibraltar specially charged to watch that coast for the protection of vessels passing through those straits.

MEDICAL GRADUATES (UNIVERSITY OF LONDON) BILL.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee read.

LORD MONTEAGLE moved, that the House do now resolve itself into Committee on this Bill, the object of which was to extend the rights enjoyed by the graduates of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, in respect of the practice of physic to the graduates of the Universities of London and Durham.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that he had no objection to this Bill, though it might, perhaps, have been well introduced in connection with the larger question of medical reform. He had given notice of his intention to move the insertion of words extending the provisions of the Bill to the Scotch Universities; but he was, at all events, anxious to provide that graduates of the Scotch Universities should no longer be under penalties for practising as physicians in England. Since he had given that notice he had had a very large number of communications from medical men of various classes, and from Professors of the Universities of Glasgow and Edinburgh, who had pointed out to him the fact, that a large number of very eminent medical men in England had nothing but a Scotch degree. Some of these gentlemen were of such eminence that they had received the honour of knighthood, yet every one of them was liable to penalties; and though the penalties were not easily recoverable, yet it was felt as an indignity that these gentlemen should be legally liable to penalties. All he wished to do was to insert a clause in this Bill to the effect, that the graduates of the Universities of Scotland should be put on the same legal standing as those of other Universities, as physicians—not as apothecaries, nor as general practitioners, but as physicians. The Durham University had been inserted in the Bill in the House of Commons, which University, he believed, had never conferred a single medical degree, and if that University had been introduced, he was at a loss to understand how the Scotch Universities, they being the great schools of medicine, ought to be omitted.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE was understood to oppose the extension of this Bill to the graduates of the Scotch Universities. He admitted, indeed, that if the University of Durham were included in the Bill, that would furnish an argument for such a course. But he thought it would be undesirable to include the University of Durham, because no one could contend that it was, at present, a school of medicine. He hoped that before long a measure might be passed to establish a uniform standard of medical qualification; but, in the meantime, he did not see that any harm could be done by passing this Bill, which simply did an act of justice by giving the graduates of the London University the privileges which they had been entitled to expect since the foundation of that institution. It was indeed said, that there was danger lest, by an implication from an old Statute of Henry VIII., this Bill might be held to extend to the practice of surgery as well as medicine. He thought, however, that this might easily be provided against by the insertion of a few words in the Bill.

LORD CAMPBELL said, that what was wanted was that the graduates of the Universities of Edinburgh and Glasgow—the most renowned schools of medicine in the world—should have equal privileges with the graduates of the University of London, and they wanted no privilege whatever that was enjoyed by the graduates of other Universities. He could not understand why the privileges of other Universities should not be extended to those of Edinburgh and Glasgow.

After a few words in explanation from the Marquess of LANSDOWNE.

LORD WYNFORD said, he was not hostile to the present Bill, but objected to partial legislation on a subject of so much importance. What was wanted was, that every man who obtained the right to practise should bring with him to the neighbourhood in which he settled some guarantee that he was a proper and safe practitioner. He recommended the Government to consider the general question during the recess, and to bring in a Bill next Session dealing with the whole subject.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY thought, that enough had been said to show that it was desirable to postpone the first clause of the Bill, in order that the subject should be considered in all its branches. A measure might then be passed next Session which should embrace everything desirable to be legislated upon in regard to this subject.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, his attention had not been directed to the Bill till he came down to the House that evening; but the conversation which had taken place was sufficient to induce him to agree with the noble Lord on the cross-benches that the House was hardly in a position to legislate on the subject. The subject of a licence to practise arising out of a degree granted by a University was one worthy of the consideration of the Government, and a measure on the subject ought not to be introduced into either House without their sanction. This measure had been introduced by a private Member; and he could say, in passing, that he believed that the University of London had better opportunities of being a good medical school, and therefore was more entitled to confer degrees, than either Oxford or Cambridge; and he did not believe that Oxford would exhibit any jealousy at such a privilege being granted to the London University. But this Bill was introduced into the House of Commons by a private Member; and another private Member said, if you give this privilege to the University of London, I claim it for the University of Durham; and the House of Commons having good-naturedly acceded to this claim, then came the noble Duke in this House, and demanded that the Scottish Universities should be put on a footing of perfect equality with the English Universities. Observe how that altered the whole character of the measure, which was now of far greater extent than when it was first introduced, and an entirely new question had been raised—namely, whether licences from the Universities in England, Ireland, and Scotland respectively should not give authority to those possessing them to practise all over the United Kingdom. He was not saying whether or not it was right to confer the privileges on one University or another, as Glasgow, St. Andrews, Aberdeen, or Dublin; or whether you should go on inserting these different Universities one after another in the Bill, or whether you should pass an exceptional Bill for the University of London alone. But what he thought was, that you should deal with the whole question in a great measure; and though the noble Marquess

(the Marquess of Lansdowne) said that a grant of this privilege to the London University could not interfere with future legislation, he could not help thinking that practically it would so interfere, and that you ought not to confer on one University privileges which might tend to interfere with legislation hereafter. This subject ought to be dealt with as a Government measure, and not be left in the hands of individual Members, who dealt with it by putting in the claims of different Universities, which were allowed or not, not according to a definite or fixed principle, but according to the caprice of the House of Commons or their Lordships' House, as they happened to be worked upon by the case presented to them. He should not himself take the sense of the House on the question of going into Committee; but if the noble Lord on the cross-benches made a Motion to delay the Bill he should vote with him.

LORD MONTEAGLE said, that the Bill was supported by the Secretary for the Home Department in the other House.

THE EARL OF DERBY: I said it was not a Government Bill, and that observation was cheered by noble Lords opposite; and yet my noble Friend says that it has been taken up by the Government.

LORD MONTEAGLE: It was taken up by them in the other House, and every Member of the Government voted for it.

LORD CAMPBELL said, he could not believe it possible that the Government would support such a measure. He should follow the example of the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby), and, although he should not move the rejection of the Bill, if any noble Lord made such a Motion, he would vote for it.

LORD WYNFORD said, although he had no hostility to the measure, yet, because that he wished that the general subject should be taken into consideration before legislation took place, he would move that the House go into Committee on the Bill this day three months.

Amendment moved, to leave out "now" and insert "this day three months."

On Question, that "now" stand part of the Motion, their Lordships divided:—Content 17; Not Content 15: Majority 2.

Resolved in the Affirmative: House in Committee accordingly: words including the University of Durham struck out: Amendments made: The Report thereof to be received on Thursday next.

BURIALS BEYOND THE METROPOLIS BILL.

Bill read 3^a (according to Order), with the Amendment. Further Amendments made.

On Motion that the Bill do pass,

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, that before the Bill passed, he wished to say a few words in explanation of what had been stated by him on a former occasion. Their Lordships would probably recollect that in calling their attention to the evil resulting from the general closing up of burial-grounds in the metropolis, he had made one statement, it appeared, not on sufficient authority; but he had made it on what he conceived at the time to be sufficient authority. The statement was to the effect that in a certain pool of water near the Eastern Counties Railway some bodies had been found, as well as some coffins, which it was conjectured had been thrown there to avoid the difficulty and expense of burying them in a parochial cemetery. He had found, however, from more careful inquiry, that it seemed to be doubtful whether any bodies were found, or any entire body was found, in that pool of water, or any more than certain fragments of coffins, and he believed some bones. It appeared likely that such remnants of coffins and bones had not been thrown in by any persons who were reduced to adopt that fatal measure by the difficulty of interring the corpses of their relatives; but that they were the remains of bodies that had been interred in unconsecrated cemeteries, and had been removed from thence to make room for others. The parish officers of Mile End seemed to consider that the statement he had made reflected upon them, and he gladly availed himself of that opportunity of saying that he meant to cast no imputation whatever on those highly respectable parish officers. The statement itself as to the finding of bodies in that pool of water he found was one made on somewhat doubtful authority: but while he admitted that, he should add that all the other statements he had made were more than borne out by subsequent inquiry. The evils that existed from the general closing of burial-grounds were most appalling; the increased expense of burials had produced pauperism in many instances, and had led to the greatest neglect of common decency. A most respectable clergyman in the north of London had informed him that so many as forty or fifty cabs and other conveyances, bearing the bodies of dead persons, were waiting until their time came for admission at the gates of unconsecrated cemeteries, and the corpses themselves were interred in a most hurried and indecent manner. Frequently the undertaker, or one of the labourers of the burial-ground, puts on a surplice, and reads such part of the burial service as he thought fit. In the main roads leading to two or three of these cemeteries the most disgraceful scenes of intoxication took place on the part of those who conveyed the bodies to them; and the distress caused to poor persons who accompanied their deceased relations to their last homes was harrowing to the feelings of every humane spectator. It was not an unimportant matter, as affecting the public health, to know that cabs were now often used for carrying the bodies of dead persons—no matter whether they had died of contagious diseases or of any other complaint—to these cemeteries, instead of being decently conveyed in some of those cheap funeral conveyances which, cheap as they were, were beyond the means of these poor persons. He could not but express his deep regret that no measures had been adopted by Her Majesty's Government for putting an end to so indecent a state of things—a state of things revolting to the feelings of every pious and humane man—a state of things which created great moral evil, and which, if allowed to continue much longer, must also produce great social evil. He knew of but one effectual remedy for it, and he trusted that Her Majesty's Government would see the necessity of adopting it early in the next Session of Parliament. He meant the giving to the Secretary of State power to compel parishes whose burial-grounds had been closed by his orders to provide new cemeteries for the interment of their own deceased poor. He would again repeat the observation he had made on a former occasion, namely, that before such orders were issued, steps ought to be taken to provide fresh burial-grounds, so that no interruption might occur in the ordinary mode of conducting funerals with decency and propriety. It was very true, that the state of things in some of the existing churchyards was extremely disgusting, and prejudicial to the public health; but if an interval had been allowed for providing new cemeteries before the closing of the old, he believed that no serious detriment to the public health would have resulted. As one who was interested in the comfort of the poorest orders of the people, and as a minister of religion, knowing the mockery of religious services which was continually occurring at interments, he could not refrain from expressing his earnest hope that Her Majesty's Government would take this matter into serious consideration, and next Session bring forward a Bill empowering the Secretary of State, under certain circumstances, to require the parishes—the large ones separately, and the smaller in combination—to provide decent burial-places for the bodies of the poor.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN could assure their Lordships that the statement made by the right rev. Prelate was most painful to hear, and one that undoubtedly required the attention of Her Majesty's Government. Indeed, the evils he had described were such as must harrow the feelings of every right-minded person. The practical difficulties of the subject, however, were much greater than the right rev. Prelate imagined. It was not sufficient to authorise the Secretary of State to compel the parishes to provide new cemeteries, as he had proposed. But undoubtedly this question had been under the consideration both of the Secretary of State and of Her Majesty's Government; and every desire was entertained to meet the wishes of the right rev. Prelate. The state of many of the burial-grounds which had been closed was such as to compel, without delay, the steps that had been taken for that purpose. At the same time, he was far from denying that much hardship had been caused both to the clergy and to the poor by what had taken place. These were evils which, difficult as the task was, ought to be met; and he could assure the right rev. Prelate that every endeavour would be made by Her Majesty's Government to remove a state of things that was disgraceful to a civilised community.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

SPIRITS (IRELAND) BILL.

VISCOUNT CANNING moved that the Bill be now read 3^d.

LORD MONTEAGLE said, he felt it a duty to call their Lordships' attention to the provisions of this measure, which he had no hesitation in saying was one which, in its present state, ought not to receive their Lordships' assent. The title of the Bill was not in the least calculated to call attention to its contents; indeed, the provisions entirely conflicted with the title; and he believed that his noble Friend who had charge of it had found it necessary to alter the title accordingly. The original title was "to amend the Acts for the better Prevention of the sale of Spirits by unlicensed Persons in Ireland;" but clauses of the utmost possible importance had been introduced, having no relation whatever to that subject, but to a much larger and more important matter. In consequence, and to comply with Parliamentary usage, the title had been altered for the purpose of including those particular provisions. This he stated in order to explain the fact that so little attention had been obtained for this measure either out of doors or within the Houses of Parliament; and, as was not unusual at that period of the Session, it had passed through its various stages in both Houses without exciting much attention, even on the part of the most active Irish Members, though, perhaps, if it had been de spiritualibus instead of de spiritibus, the case would have been different, and the Bill would have been more fully considered. Their Lordships were aware that there existed in Ireland a force called the constabulary, and he might fearlessly assert that there was not an individual who had been brought in contact with the administration of the law in Ireland, or with the Irish Government, who would not be ready to do justice to that force, as being one of the most valuable institutions in that country. This force consisted of 12,000 men, well appointed and well disciplined, supported at an expense of 500,000*l.* annually, and originally established by the late Marquess of Wellesley for the exclusive purpose of preserving the public peace. In deference to that principle there were certain duties and functions from which, by law, the constabulary were excluded. They were excluded, for instance, from anything connected with the preservation of game, or the protection of fisheries, the collection of rents and tithes, and specialiter excluded from the collection of the public revenue or the enforcement of the laws against smuggling. Successive Acts which had since received the sanction of the Legislature had repeated those exceptions. Their Lordships were now, however, called upon by the present Bill, which was introduced under another title, to repeal the wise provisions of all those Acts, and to apply the constabulary force of Ireland, for the first time, to the collection of the public revenue and the enforcement of its penalties. By one of the provisions of the Bill the Lord Lieutenant was authorised to declare certain districts in a state of insubordination to the Distillery Laws, and, thereupon, by virtue of this order of his Excellency, all the constabulary force in each proclaimed district were converted, ipso facto, into Excise officers. Let their Lordships consider for one moment what would be the effect of such an enactment. The Excise law, as everybody knew, was wholly separate and distinguishable from the ordinary municipal law, which the constabulary were hitherto called upon to execute. It was much more complicated and difficult, and required from those connected with that department duties of a very peculiar kind. It also conferred on those who administered it much greater powers. Excise officers were entitled to resort to very stringent authority, and, among other prerogatives, were entitled to proceed without the sanction of the civil magistrate, and to repel force by force by using the firearms which they held in their hands, and to fire, if necessary, in the execution of their duty upon any mob who might venture to oppose them. They had also power to break into any house at any time, by day or night, if they found such extreme measures necessary. Those who had looked practically into the subject—he referred, for example, to the clear evidence of that able and excellent public officer, Mr. John Wood, the head of the Board of Inland Revenue—had distinctly stated that the functions of the two classes of officers, the exciseman and the constable, were entirely distinguishable; that the power of the Excise officer in executing his duty was infinitely greater than the power of the constable; and that the protection which the law afforded him was proportionally greater likewise. An exciseman, for instance, had power to break into a house without special warrant, and at any time upon any information he might receive; by one of the clauses of this Bill, which transferred the Revenue duties to the constabulary, any constable, or sub-constable, even a young man who was for the first time appointed to discharge this service, was empowered by day or night—for the words were, at all times in quest of illicit spirits, or of persons who had sold spirits without a licence—to enter houses and enforce the law. These were functions and powers with which he had never hitherto been entrusted. Now, he put it to their Lordships, whether it was within the bounds of reason that by an Act of Parliament of this description they would at once communicate to these persons the whole knowledge necessary to enable them to discharge the duties that would be required of them under the Excise laws? Could they by an Act of Parliament, instruct the whole constabulary of Ireland with what would be a miraculous knowledge of the Excise code? A Select Committee had, indeed, sat upon the Bill; but not one tittle of evidence had been given by any person in favour of the scheme which the Bill was intended to carry into effect—indeed, all the evidence was to the contrary effect. But more wonders were to follow. The constabulary being turned into excisemen by Act of Parliament, at once came under the control of the Board of Excise, who would thus acquire a jurisdiction that would necessarily conflict with that of the magistracy, and of the staff of the constabulary, who would no longer have the power of regulating the force for the preservation of the peace. What would be the consequence? Endless contradiction and confusion. When the men were required for the preservation of the public peace, they might be ordered by the Excise to scour the country for the purpose of putting down illicit distillation. When ordered out by the Excise, they might be required to suppress an Orange or a Riband meeting. But, he was told, that as soon as the constabulary in a particular district were turned into excisemen, it was intended to withdraw the existing revenue police, who really knew their business, and to leave it wholly to the care of the constables, who were wholly ignorant of these new duties. The distribution of the constabulary force wholly unfitted it for such duties. At present they were distributed in small parties over the surface of Ireland, though they were chiefly concentrated in those parts where the population was the densest. The revenue police, on the contrary, were stationed in larger parties, not where the constables were quartered, but in the mountains and bogs, where there was a thin population, and where peculiar facilities existed for violating the Excise laws. Thus the constabulary were now necessarily distributed in the most populous districts of Ireland, whilst the service they would be called upon to perform under this Bill was in the least-peopled and least-accessible districts. Who could reconcile these contradictions? Then what was this novel service? It was no other than what was termed in Ireland “still-hunting.” The constables hereafter would be engaged in interrupting the profitable, though illegal, practices of a large portion of the population; and that could not be done unless they went with an armed force sufficient to render resistance unavailing. The force of opinion, which now made their strength, would be lost. The constables went about in twos and threes by day or night. But pass this Bill, and they could no more proceed, or venture to proceed, in the small parties in which they were accustomed to patrol the country, than they could fly; neither could their parties be augmented in numbers except by withdrawing the police officers from their primary duty of preserving the public peace. So that if they were required to patrol the roads, to attend the petty or quarter sessions, and execute their proper duties, what would become of illicit distillation? If, on the other hand, they were employed in suppressing illicit distillation, what became of the protection to property and the preservation of the peace? When the constables were employed in preserving the peace, the illicit distiller would be at work; when acting as Excise officers the robber and the housebreaker would go unmolested. He protested against a measure of this kind as dangerous to the public peace, and inconsistent with their Lordships’ past and wise legislation. But it should also be remembered that there was a revenue police already in existence; it was well organised, and under admirable officers. If that force were insufficient, increase it, but do not take away the force which was necessary for the general administration of the law. He believed that if there were a corrupting duty upon earth, it was that of the revenue service in a county or district where illicit distillation prevailed. The discipline of the British Army itself had broken down and crumbled under the temptation and influences connected with the manifold attempts to suppress illicit distillation in Ireland. A general order was issued that on no account whatever was any party to proceed upon revenue duty except under the command of a commissioned officer. Now if the British Army had been found to be incapable of executing those functions unless commanded by a commissioned officer, how could they think it possible that a much less disciplined force—the constabulary of Ireland—would, acting alone, be able to resist all the temptations which drink, bribery, and corruption would introduce into their body if Parliament permitted the Bill to pass in its present shape? If it be necessary, let the Government increase the number of the revenue police in Ireland to any extent; but, as they wished the peace of Ireland, let them not attempt to employ the constabulary on revenue duty. He had great confidence in the revenue police and its administration, and also in the constabulary, but he had no confidence at all in any double administration, such as would be exercised over a body acting as excisemen at one time and constables at another. Their Lordships were aware that the most hearty good-will was now generally manifested towards the constabulary by the people of Ireland. They could move by night or by day in districts the most remote without the apprehension of any attack being made upon them. Such was the confidence placed in the constabulary force in Ireland, that they are frequently made the depositories of information which the Government themselves could not obtain. But what would be the result if the force were in future sent out for the purpose of destroying the stills upon the mountains? They would lose that confidence and good-will of the people, and a feeling of enmity and distrust would inevitably be engendered. He thanked God that Ireland was at present in a state of peace and safety. What was the result of such a state of things? Why, that within the last two months the Government had withdrawn twelve regiments, which formed as it were the heart of the garrison of Ireland. They had been ordered abroad to carry the glory of England into distant lands, and the duties hitherto performed by the soldiers were now in a great measure discharged by the constabulary force, which it was proposed to debase by this Bill. He, therefore, considered it peculiarly unwise to employ the constabulary at the present moment in the way proposed by this Bill. There were not now as many soldiers as there were constabulary in Ireland. Was this a time to employ the latter body in a service in which they would feel themselves degraded? Sir Duncan M'Gregor, the head of the force in Ireland, declared that no employment could be more odious to the constabulary than that which should bring them in connection with revenue duty. This Bill, if passed in its present shape, would infuse a spirit of discontent among the constabulary at a time when there was increasing difficulties in recruiting their numbers. Mr. Wood, the Chairman of

Lord Monteagle

Inland Revenue, expressed an opinion similar to that of Sir D. M'Gregor. Upon those grounds, and acting on the strongest convictions, he should, after the Bill had been read a third time, move the omission of those clauses in the Bill which sanctioned the employment of the constabulary on revenue duty.

Bill read 3^a (according to Order) with the Amendments.

LORD MONTEAGLE then moved an Amendment in section 2, the effect of which was to take away from "sub-constables" the right of breaking into houses for the purpose of discovering illicit spirits. These sub-constables were generally young men, and hence they ought not to be intrusted with these large powers. He thought that this and other clauses of the Bill showed that it had not received a very large amount of care in the other House.

VISCOUNT CANNING said, that though no Member of that House had a better right to express an opinion on this subject than the noble Lord who had last addressed the House, still he (Viscount Canning) thought that he was justified in objecting to the view that the noble Lord had taken of this measure. With respect to what had been said as to the title of the Bill, it was true that when the Bill came up from the other House, the title had failed to express the provisions which were to be found in the measure, and when the discrepancy was pointed out it was remedied; and at all events the objection was one which was entitled to small weight. In order to prove that the Bill had received due consideration in the other House, he begged to remind his noble Friend that the clause at first inserted in the Bill, and which he (Lord Monteagle) supposed would put in jeopardy a large amount of revenue, had in the other House been omitted—the objections to the clause having been allowed to prevail, and when the Bill came up to their Lordships' House it contained no clause which could justify such an objection. Not only was the Bill amply discussed in the other House, but he begged also to state that, after considerable discussion, it passed without any opposition, excepting such as led to merely nominal divisions. The Amendment proposed by his noble Friend was brought forward on the ground that the sub-constables were young and inexperienced men, who could not be trusted with the delicate duties which would attach to them under this Bill. But none of these constables could act unless he had a warrant specifically addressed to himself, and he (Viscount Canning) thought that he might confidently state that there was a large number of these public servants, who were by no means young or inexperienced, but who, on the contrary, had been many years in the service, who had been distinguished by good-service marks, and who, in the case of the illness or absence of a chief constable, were frequently trusted with the command of a station. He thought, therefore, that if it were left to those in authority to select from these men—who as a body were thought worthy of trust—the most worthy, no bad result could arise from the sub-constables being intrusted with powers given under this Act. If this Amendment were inserted, then the Lord Lieutenant, in not being able to avail himself of the sub-constables, would only, out of a force of 13,000, be able to employ 1,500, and this would by a side-wind have the effect of defeating the purpose of the 13th clause. He thought that his noble Friend was hardly, by the wording of the 13th clause, justified in saying that the Lord Lieutenant would have power of converting the constabulary into excisemen, which would degrade them and render them comparatively useless in the discharge of the more legitimate services, and he had quoted the authority of Sir Duncan M'Gregor as being hostile to this change. He must also demur to the description given by his noble Friend of the evidence taken before the Committee last year. He must admit that Sir D. M'Gregor, throughout his evidence, expressed himself against any such general change as it was supposed would be effected by the present Bill, and it was perfectly natural for that gentleman, seeing how effective and well disciplined the force under him was, to desire to leave well alone. But Sir D. M'Gregor had, when pressed, said that he would undertake the duties which the proposed changes would require if they were imposed upon him, and he had also supported the evidence of others who had expressed an opinion that if the constabulary were employed in putting down illicit distillation, though this might at first create a sensation, yet after three or four months it would cease, and that the constabulary by performing these duties would not lose the good opinion and esteem of the people. With respect to the power given to the Lord Lieutenant under the 13th clause, it was not too much to suppose that he would, in the exercise of such discretionary power, try the experiment proposed by the present Bill, not in Donegal or counties where illicit distillation prevailed to a large extent, but rather in those counties where illicit distillation existed only to a small extent, and could be put down by the constabulary, even if they were so unfit for this duty as his noble Friend had stated. This measure would afford the opportunity of trying a safe and easy experiment, and even if it failed, limited to time as it was by the Act, it could not be productive of mischievous results; he therefore asked their Lordships to reject the proposed Amendments.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE supported the Amendment. He begged their Lordships to recollect that, although the whole revenue police of Ireland only amounted to 947, yet, by the regulations of that force, the execution of warrants was only intrusted to 151 officers; and yet by the Bill now before them they were called upon to grant to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland the power of authorising any one out of 13,000 persons to enter any dwelling in the country at any hour of the night. And although his noble Friend and relative (Viscount Canning) told their Lordships that the Lord Lieutenant would never exercise the powers which were given to him, he conceived that formed no answer to the objection; for if they were never meant to be used, why, he would ask, were they allowed to him? His more grave objection, however, to the Bill was founded on the employment at all of the constabulary in such service. He would say with confidence that there did not exist in any country of the world a police equal to that of Ireland. That force had been always regarded as a model force, even in this country; and when Sir Robert Peel wanted to make the London police perfect, where did he turn for a model, but to Ireland? He would therefore ask their Lordships, ought such a force as that to be distracted from its proper occupations—ought so gratuitous an injury to be inflicted upon it as this Bill contemplated, without the best possible reasons being shown for such a proceeding; and especially at a moment when, our soldiers being withdrawn, the whole maintenance of order depended upon the constabulary? But believing no such reasons had been shown, he should most certainly support the Amendment of the noble Lord.

LORD MONTEAGLE said, it was not his intention to divide their Lordships on the present Amendment, but would take the division on the 13th clause.

On Question, that Clause 13 stand part of the Bill, their Lordships divided:—Content 17; Not Content 11: Majority 6.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

THE BOARD OF HEALTH—MOTION FOR PAPERS.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY: My Lords, in moving for the papers and correspondence of which I have given notice, I must take the opportunity of vindicating myself and my honour against a charge which has been made by another person in another place, seriously affecting my personal honour and character for veracity. I feel, my Lords, that it may be of little importance to the world at large what may be the character of so humble an individual as myself; but, as a Member of your Lordships' House, it is a matter of some importance that I should stand erect before you, and either refute the charge which has been made, or submit to the contumely which its confirmation would inflict upon me. I am able, my Lords, to give the flattest possible contradiction to every item of the charge which has been made. It will be within your recollection that some time ago I made a statement, in which I mentioned that, during the transactions of the Board of Health, a meeting was held at which a certain noble Lord was present, at which I myself was present, and at which other Commissioners were present—that the noble Lord made a proposal, and that that proposal fell. The noble Lord stated that it fell in consequence of not being seconded. My assertion was that the term "seconded" never occurred—that it never was seconded—that the term never was used—that the proposal was made, and that it was met by myself. In opposition to this, I heard a statement made yesterday by the noble Lord in these words—

"He had gone to the Board on several occasions; he went to them, for example, on the 30th of January, 1851, at the request of the Government in a special case. . . He went to the Board of Health on this subject. This was on the 30th of January, 1851. The Board read to him a long letter of seven pages, which they had prepared, and in which they argued the point with the Treasury. Thereupon, as the minutes recorded,

—'Lord Seymour moved that a letter should be sent instead of the proposed draught, stating that the Board are ready to act on the suggestions contained in the Treasury letter. This motion not being seconded, Lord Seymour stated that he wished that the Treasury should be informed, when the Board's letter is transmitted, that he differs from it.' Now, as to this matter, Lord Shaftesbury, in his place elsewhere, had stated that the thing had not happened as he (Lord Seymour) had described it on a former occasion. Lord Shaftesbury, speaking upon his honour, spoke, it was to be remembered, upon the information of the secretary—not having been himself present on the occasion—whereas he (Lord Seymour), having been present, spoke from his own recollection."

Mark the words! This is the way in which the noble Lord strikes down another man's honour, and endeavours to erect his own. He solemnly affirms, in opposition to my former statement, that I was not present. In the first place, I give my word of honour solemnly, and in the most emphatic manner that a gentleman can do, and under the most solemn obligations of an oath, that I was present. I give my word of honour that I was the person who spoke upon the subject, and that my colleagues said not a word. The noble Lord has committed himself by specifying the date. It is possible that there might have been a day on which I was not present; but he specifies three times emphatically, that upon the 30th of January, 1851, he went to that Board—that he made a proposal—that I was not there—and that I, speaking on my honour, when I assert that I was there, have asserted that which is untrue. Now, I state first, upon my word of honour as a gentleman, that I was there. Hear next the evidence—and first the written testimony of two of my colleagues—

"The General Board of Health, Whitehall,
August 1, 1854.

"We declare most solemnly that we were present at a Board held on the 30th of January, 1851, the day on which it is recorded in the minutes that 'Lord Seymour attended and made a motion that was not seconded,' and we further declare that Lord Shaftesbury was present and made the proposition which was adopted. On our remembrance being called to Lord Seymour's allegation that he had been told that his motion had not been seconded, we declare that he was not so told by us, or by Lord Shaftesbury in our presence on that occasion; nor do we believe that he was so told on any other occasion whatsoever.

"EDWIN CHADWICK.

"T. SOUTHWOOD SMITH."

Hear now the letter from Mr. Macaulay, the secretary, who was present at the time, and who writes to me to-day in the following terms—

"My impression is, that you were present at the meeting of the Board on the 30th of January, 1851. The matter, however, can be placed beyond the possibility of doubt by reference to the fair and rough minutes of the 30th of January, where the attendances of each member of the Board are carefully recorded. "C. MACAULAY."

What say the minutes? I refer to the fair minutes—I refer to the rough minutes, and I find—

"Extract from minutes of Thursday, January 30, 1851. Present—Lord Seymour, M.P.; Lord Ashley, M.P.; Edwin Chadwick, Esq.; Dr. S. Smith."

And now I am to be told, in the presence of the country and of the House of Commons, that, speaking upon my honour, I have been guilty of a falsehood when I assert what I have done, not upon any single testimony alone, but supported by that of my two colleagues, of the secretary, and of the minutes, which cannot lie. Now, one more statement. He goes on to say—

"Lord Shaftesbury had made it a charge against him that he had never attended the Board; this was not the case, though it was the case that he had ceased to attend the Board when he had found by experience that it was to no purpose that he attended a Board where he was systematically overborne, while he could occupy his time to really useful public purposes in his own office. The noble Earl had added that he (Lord Seymour) had told him, in confidence, that he never meant to do anything that he was not compelled to do. He would not be so discourteous as to go into any discussion with the noble Earl as to the expression so attributed to him; all he would observe was, that if he had said this to the noble Earl in confidence, his confidence had been much misplaced."

Hear what I did say,—I asserted that he stayed away, not because he was opposed, but because he had predetermined not to come, and I proved it by his statement to me a few days after he took office, that he could not attend, by his allowing sixty-eight Boards to be held between his first and second attendance, five between the second and third, ten between the third and fourth, and ninety-four between the fourth and fifth, when for the first and only time he met with a difference of opinion. I say that this completely proves that he never intended to come to the Board; and when he says he did not come because he was constantly overborne, my simple reply to him is, that he never did intend to come. Again, he says that he told me in confidence that he never meant to do anything he was not compelled to do. I never said that Lord Seymour had said to me in confidence that he would not do more than he was compelled to do. Lord Seymour never said it in confidence to any one; he said it to myself, he said it to my colleagues, he said it to Lord Ebrington, and he wrote it to the Board on the 14th of January, 1851, in these words—

"It is not in my power to attend the meetings of the Board of Health without neglect of my duties here."

Further on, speaking of the period when the powers of the Board of Health as conferred by the Act were about to close, the noble Lord said—

"This was precisely the time when the Legislature was properly called upon to review the operation of the measure, and nothing could be more unreasonable than the proposition of a noble Earl elsewhere—the non-official member and patron of the Board (Lord Shaftesbury)—that such review of its proceedings was an unhandsome attack upon absent individuals."

I never said that, nor anything like that. I said that for any gentleman to speak of men like his then colleagues, and to say that they "could be made to do their duty only by fear of losing their salaries," was an indecent and cruel charge which ought not to be made against absent men—against men to whom no notice had been given, and who, therefore, had no means of denying what was said. That is what I said, and what I most emphatically repeat, for I think that a charge made in such a tone and temper and manner against gentlemen as good in every respect as himself was an act of gross and intolerable indecency.

"In order," he says, "that such objectionable proceedings might not occur again, he had sent to the Board of Health requiring copies of all the minutes of their proceedings, so that he might see what was going on, it being impossible for him at that time—the Board of Works and the Board of Woods being then united—to attend at the Board of Health, who were in the habit of holding Boards every day for some three or four minutes per diem."

Now, anything more unwarrantable, and, I say again, more cruel, towards those meritorious and hard-working men, I never yet heard. I will undertake to prove that the average attendances at that Board were five hours a day at least—sometimes six or seven hours; and, when the cholera was raging, and in times of great pressure, as much as ten hours a day. Almost every night, also, business was taken home by the two Commissioners, on which they had to occupy themselves during the night, in order to prepare themselves to receive deputations or to transact important business on the following morning. The noble Lord went on to say—

"He must express the opinion that the jobbing of the Board of Health presented an amount of dirt which must be very startling to the clean party in question. The whole thing was perfectly monstrous."

Here, again, is a charge of corruption which he knows well he cannot prove! This he calls, no doubt, "a review of the Board's proceedings;" without inquiry, without power of reply on the part of the accused. Is it wise, is it just, is it safe that any body of legislators should proceed to act upon such evidence as this? These are samples of the whole speech; there is hardly an assertion that might not be met by as flat a contradiction. They show the spirit of the man, the character of his charges, and the whole system of the attacks on the Board. He was pleased to reflect very contemptuously on myself and all my public actions and opinions. Partly through indifference, and partly through inability, I shall not endeavour to make any reply. It may be an infirmity, or even a vice, but so the fact is, that I do not much care for the opinion of my contemporaries, and nothing at all for the opinion of posterity. What I do care for is the conviction that I have, by God's blessing, "done my duty in that state of life to which it has pleased God to call me," and that conviction cannot be taken away either by Lord Seymour or the House of Commons. The noble Earl concluded by moving—

"That there be laid before this House, Copies of any Correspondence from Local Boards of Health in reply to Inquiries from Towns where the Application of the Public Health Act was under Consideration; and also of any Communications from Chairmen or Officers of Local Boards on the opposition made to the Continuance of the General Board: And also, Copy of any Memorial from the Clergy of the Metropolis in relation to the Metropolitan Interment Act."

On Question, agreed to.

House adjourned to Thursday next.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE (No. 2) BILL.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

The Earl of Shaftesbury

MR. GEACH moved, as an Amendment, that the House be put into Committee on that day three months. He did so because no opportunity had been given for properly discussing the subject. But few Members, he believed, were acquainted with the provisions of this measure, and he himself knew hardly anything of its nature until it had been read a second time. Its object was to assimilate the law on the subject in this country to that of Scotland, in one particular, by providing summary means of procuring judgment on a bill of exchange, when dishonoured. It provided that, on registering the Bill, before a registrar to be appointed for the purpose, execution might be obtained, and a man driven into bankruptcy, or his effects completely sold off, within six days after the bill had been dishonoured. He regretted that the practice of the Scotch law in this respect, and its working in commerce, were not better understood in that House. It might have been found to be attended with advantage in Scotland, but there were circumstances peculiar to Scotland which might account for that, and the want of which in this country might disappoint the expectations of its promoters. One of these circumstances was the greater extent of the banking system in Scotland as compared with England. As regarded merchants and others in a large way of business in England, the measure was clearly unnecessary; for their position was such, that the moment their affairs wore a threatening aspect, they were obliged to communicate the circumstance to their creditors. The harsh operation of the measure would be most felt by persons in a smaller way of business; for it would certainly happen under this measure that a man with 30*s.* in the pound would be forced into bankruptcy, and though so well able to pay the claims upon him, his ruin would most likely be as complete as if his circumstances were less favourable. Under this Bill a man would be driven to register a dishonoured Bill; for, unless he did so, another party to it would come in and do so, and take advantage of him. To illustrate the want of necessity for this measure, he might state that, for a period of eighteen years, he had been manager of a joint stock bank at Birmingham, a town whose transactions were best fitted to illustrate the subject. During that period, 246,000 bills of exchange had passed through that bank, amounting in value to 20,000,000*l.*, or the low average of 85*l.* each. Though the average was so low, only 30,000 of these bills had been returned, and the result of the whole was, that only in one single case had the bank to go into a court of law, and in eighteen cases only did they lose money, their total loss amounting to less than 2,000*l.* He contended, then, that the credit system of this country was a safe one, that the creditors had ample means already of enforcing their claims, and that a measure proposing so sweeping a reform in the law between debtor and creditor ought to have been preceded by the Report of a Commission specially appointed to investigate the subject. For these reasons he begged to move that the House go into Committee on the Bill on that day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee," instead thereof.

SIR ERSKINE PERRY* opposed the Amendment, as the present Bill was a sound measure of law reform, and completely in accordance with the spirit of legislation of the present day. It was a mistake to represent it, as the hon. Member for Coventry (Mr. Geach) had just done, as a great change in the law; it did not at all alter the law as related to bills of exchange, but it enabled parties who were compelled to go to law to obtain their remedy in the simplest and most economical manner possible. This was the great object of all sound procedure, and it was entirely in accordance with the useful measure which had just passed through the committee of that House—the Common Law Procedure Act. What were the facts as regarded bills of exchange? It had been ascertained that out of one thousand actions, in not more than one was there any real defence; and the object aimed at was, to provide that in the nine hundred and ninety-nine defenceless cases, no sham defence or pleas for delay should be set up, or time and money be thrown away in unnecessary litigation. He had listened attentively to the arguments of the hon. Member for Coventry, and he had also made himself master of the objections which had been urged out of doors against this Bill; and they all reduced themselves to one position, namely, that a debtor who has entered into a solemn engagement to pay a sum of money on a certain day, should have what the hon. gentleman called a "breathing time" allowed him. But this principle was wholly unsound, and opposed to the clearest principles, both of good faith and expediency. What is desirable is, that the contracts entered into between man and man should be observed spontaneously and with punctuality; but if the assistance of a court of justice is to be called in, it should be done with as much efficacy and with as little vexation and expense as may be. The true function, in fact, of a court of justice in civil matters is to give effect to the contracts which individuals chose to enter into with one another.

In that system of laws which Lord Lyndhurst once pronounced to be the noblest monument of wisdom ever erected by man—the civil law—the prætor used to inscribe on his yearly album this principle as the guide to all his proceedings: Pacta conventa servabo ait Prætor; and all our legislation, as to courts of law, ought to aim at embodying the same principle. Unfortunately, in our common-law courts, a narrowness of interpretation and a sacrifice of substance to technicalities, had too often prevailed; and courts of equity, with their larger views and clearer perception of the true functions of a court of justice, had become necessary; but the reforms of the present day have the scope of enabling the truth to be arrived at in every kind of court, in the most simple and effectual manner that can be devised.

The hon. Member for Coventry had taken up a very popular side, when he pleaded so earnestly for debtors, and for leniency towards them; but nothing was so dangerous as to be carried away by feeling in a question to be decided only by reason and experience. He (Sir E. Perry) had had much to do in adjudicating between creditor and debtor, and in the court over which he had presided for many years, there was a summary jurisdiction which enabled the judge to give time to the debtor to pay his judgment debt. But he was satisfied, from long experience, and after many ineffectual attempts to temper justice with mercy, that it was an improper interposition of the judge to interfere between the parties as to the contracts they had entered into. He is never in the position to know exactly what the condition of the parties is; and often, when he flatters himself he is performing an act of the highest grace, he is committing great injustice, and is, in fact, setting aside the law which parties have prescribed to one another, and which it is his duty to administer.

The sound principle, therefore, is, that debtors and creditors should make their own terms with one another, and that courts of justice should only interfere to lend their machinery and enforce the contracts when required. In this observation will be found a complete answer to the argument so much relied on by the hon. Member for Coventry, derived from his banking experience at Birmingham. He has stated, that out of 30,000 returned bills, only eighteen actions had been brought, and that the rest were settled between the parties out of court. Assuming for a moment the correctness of his statistics—though one does not see how a bank, which looks to its own customer on a dishonoured bill, is able to ascertain the history of each bill after it leaves its own till and has been taken up by the discount—still, exactly the same reasons which operate now to prevent creditors from pressing harshly on their debtors, will be in operation under this new Bill. There are laws stronger than any this House can frame, which are in operation to prevent oppression and undue harshness in cases of this nature—these are, the laws of human nature, self interest, and the regard for the opinion of one's neighbour, which intervenes to prevent creditors from ruining their debtors, that is, their customers, and from insisting on the letter of the law, when a little timely forbearance will strengthen and foster the healthy connection between them.

But the hon. Gentleman spoke with alarm of the extraordinary extent to which credit has spread itself in this country, and the danger to which it may be exposed by a measure of this kind. The House, however, I apprehend, will not listen to an argument in behalf of artificial props, or to anything which restricts the natural and healthy workings of society after its own spontaneous promptings. If numerous classes of the community give bills of exchange, and enter into solemn engagements to pay money which they cannot meet, the law ought not, by its vicious legal procedure, to encourage such rotten speculations. An argument from Birmingham on this subject, supported, as it seems to be, by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner), is fraught with suspicion, and will carry little weight with the House. Indeed, he

Sir E. Perry.

(Sir E. Perry) had been disappointed in finding such little validity in the objections of the hon. Member for Coventry; for he had understood that he had a great case to bring forward against this Bill. The only plausible objection he had heard raised against the measure was, that it gave the holder of a bill of exchange a great advantage, by way of remedy, over a creditor on a simple contract debt. Undoubtedly, if any form of procedure could be devised by which judgment in an undefended action in every case could be secured to the creditor as speedily as under this Bill, it would be a great boon to the public. But an essential difference exists between a simple contract debt and a bill of exchange, which always has made the latter an effectual security. In the former, say an action for goods sold, everything has to be proved, the contract, the delivery of the goods, the conditions of sale, the amount of credit; in the latter, everything is specified and reduced to writing between the parties.

In the present measure the House has the satisfaction of knowing that it is taking up no speculative reform, but is adopting a practice which has been in force for 170 years in Scotland, where the system of credit and banking operations generally have taken a firmer and healthier root than in any other country in Europe. All the great commercial countries of the Continent—France, Holland, Belgium, Germany, and Spain—have adopted summary proceedings, with regard to bills of exchange; and it had occurred to him more than once, whilst presiding over a court of justice, to hear foreign merchants complain of being compelled to bring a regular formal suit in an English court of justice, and to be delayed for months, on a bill of exchange, when nothing, in fact, required to be proved.

He trusted, therefore, that the House would allow the Bill to go into Committee, and he would assure them, that, notwithstanding the long list of Amendments which had been suggested by the legal profession, there were only two or three points on which it would be necessary to take the opinion of the House. The substitution of attorneys for notaries had been proposed, but he believed the idea was abandoned by the hon. and learned Member by whom it had been made, and it was clearly unsound. Another proposition had been brought forward, that the office of registrar should be filled by one of the Masters of the Common Pleas; but it was most necessary, for the due working of the Bill, that a separate officer should be located in the heart of the City, with no other functions to attend to; and not the least of the advantages attending this course would be, that it would enable all men of business to take the necessary steps on a dishonoured bill by their own clerks, and without any legal assistance. He had no desire to say a word against the profession to which he had the honour to belong, but he was satisfied that the interests of the public essentially required that they should never be compelled to call in a lawyer, unless a case for legal acumen and technical knowledge actually occurred.

Lastly, he would beg the House to observe under what auspices the Bill was introduced to them. It had passed through the House of Lords, where it had been supported by the Government, and had been submitted to a Committee of law Lords, including the Lord Chief Justice, Lord Brougham, and the Lord Chancellor, who had unanimously approved of it. The measure itself had emanated from a committee of London merchants and bankers, and had been discussed at public meetings at Liverpool, Leeds, Bradford, Manchester, &c., petitions from many of which places he had himself presented; and the other day the Lord President of the Council (Lord J. Russell) had presented a petition in favour of the measure from merchants and traders of the City of London, which, he had been informed, was more numerously signed by members of the mercantile community than any petition which had emanated from the City of London during the last fifty years.

Mr. SPOONER said, he had no doubt that many bankers and merchants connected with the City of London were anxious to have this Bill passed, for he could easily conceive that those who were concerned in extensive bill transactions might be naturally desirous, if drawers of bills did not meet their engagements, to have the means of compelling them speedily to fulfil such engagements. The great evil of this measure, however, would be that it would force numbers of small traders into hasty bankruptcy—a result which might be avoided by judicious treatment on the part of the holders of their bills. The hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Sir E. Perry) had said that debtors and creditors should be left to settle their own arrangements. That was his (Mr. Spooner's) opinion; but this Bill would interfere with those arrangements, for it would compel the holders of bills of exchange to proceed according to the provisions of the measure. The holder of bills of exchange would practically be compelled to adopt proceedings, because, if he did not do so, he would lose his claim on the collateral securities. They were told that the system proposed to be established by this Bill worked well in Scotland, but in Scotland there was no circulation of small bills of exchange. In England one tradesman drew a bill upon another, and passed it to a third, and it seldom came into a banker's possession until it had gone through a great many hands; but in Scotland the small bills were not paid away, but remained with the bankers until they were due. No case of necessity had been shown for the adoption of this Bill; he thought it would probably occasion very great evils, and he would, therefore, support the Amendment.

Mr. WILSON observed that it was a great error to suppose that small bills of exchange did not circulate in Scotland, for there was, in fact, no part of the United Kingdom where trade was carried on to such an extent by bills of exchange of small amount as in Scotland. He did not believe that the adoption of this Bill would lead to any diminution of the accommodation now afforded to customers, and he would, therefore, support the measure.

Mr. JAMES MACGREGOR opposed the Bill and expressed his opinion that Mr. Geach's very extensive acquaintance with banking and commerce entitled him to considerable respect. He opposed the Bill on principle without asking any favour for debtors, but merely asking that all debtors might be put upon a legal footing. He considered that the law might very well be allowed to remain in its present state until another Session, and that if any Amendment were required it ought to be general, instead of being confined to bills of exchange, and thus giving a preference to the holders of such bills over contract creditors.

Clause 1.

Mr. JAMES MACGREGOR moved an Amendment, providing that the Bill should not come into operation until the 24th of October, 1856, instead of the 24th of October, 1854, as was proposed by this clause. He considered that a sufficient time would not elapse between the termination of the Session and the 24th of October next to enable the trading and mercantile classes of this country to become thoroughly acquainted with the provisions of the measure.

Mr. GEACH supported the Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL suggested that bills accepted previous to the Bill coming into operation should be excepted from the operation of the Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to; as were also Clauses 2 and 3.

Clause 4 (appointing a registrar of protested Bills).

MR. MASSEY thought it inexpedient to appoint a new officer, when there were already many officers of the Court of Common Pleas who were altogether underworked.

SIR E. PERRY, in advocating the propriety of a new officer, explained that the new officer would not be paid by salary, but merely by fees. As to the Court of Common Pleas, there was no doubt there was too large a staff there both of judges and of officers, and that the fifteen judges might be advantageously reduced in number.

MR. BOWYER pointed out that fees were as much a burden upon the country as salaries. The Masters of the Common Pleas at present received 1,200*l.* a year for doing very little, and the obvious propriety of the case was, that the junior Master should earn his salary by performing the functions created by this Bill.

MR. HENLEY altogether objected to the appointment of a new officer, when there were five officers of the Court of Common Pleas who ought to have something given them to do, for their large, all but, sinecures. He also objected to pay the new officer by means of fees.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL suggested that, as there were several other Orders of the Day, it would be better to report progress on this Bill.

MR. MACGREGOR hoped that the further consideration of the Bill would not be set down for some occasion when the Government had arranged to have a majority present.

Mr. J. Macgregor

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered on Friday next.

THE CASE OF MR. JEREMIAH SMITH—QUESTION.

MR. FREWEN said, he begged to inquire whether the Secretary of State for the Home Department had any objection to lay upon the table of the House a copy of a certificate which it had been stated was signed by every one of the jury who tried Mr. Jeremiah Smith, the late Mayor of Rye, and found him guilty of having committed wilful and corrupt perjury before a Committee of that House, and who had lately represented to his Lordship that they believed Mr. Jeremiah Smith to be innocent of the crime; and in consequence of this representation his Lordship had advised Her Majesty to grant him a free pardon.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON stated, in reply, that the case of Mr. Jeremiah Smith had been frequently brought under his notice by a great number of memorials, and by numerous persons who had interceded in his behalf; but, nevertheless, upon a full consideration of the case, and the evidence upon which Mr. Smith was convicted, he had not felt it to be his duty to advise the Crown to interfere with the execution of the sentence. On the 20th of July he had received from the jurors a document which he had no objection to lay upon the table if required, stating that the undersigned jurors who had tried Mr. Jeremiah Smith, and had pronounced him guilty of wilful and corrupt perjury, expressed their strong recommendation that mercy should be extended to him on the ground of its having been represented to them, and they believing it to be true at the time they gave their verdict, that the seat for Rye had not been abandoned when Mr. Smith gave his evidence, and that such evidence was given with a corrupt motive of retaining the seat for that borough. They stated that they now believed that the seat was then abandoned, and hence that there was no corrupt motive on the part of Mr. Smith, and they trusted that mercy would be extended to him. As a general rule, he attached more weight to the opinions of a jury expressed in their verdict founded upon evidence given upon oath than upon any opinions which might be founded upon statements subsequently given without the security of an oath or the sifting of a cross-examination, and he did not, therefore, feel disposed to advise the Crown to act in accordance with this memorial. The grounds upon which he had taken that step were that he had received, on the 25th of July, the following letter from the surgeon of Newgate—

"I feel it my duty to state to your Lordship that the present condition of Jeremiah Smith, a prisoner here, is most critical. He is very feeble in every way, and he is now suffering from head-symptoms of a very serious character, threatening apoplexy. I consider his illness the more alarming on account of several members of his family having died from similar attacks, and I cannot answer for the effects of prolonged imprisonment on the prisoner, whose habits had previously been very active."

He felt that, although Mr. Smith might have been justly sentenced to a term of imprisonment, still he had not merited a sentence of death, and it was upon these grounds, and not in any way in connection with the opinion of the jury, that he had deemed it right to advise Her Majesty to grant a free pardon.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he wished to ask the noble Lord whether, as he proposed to lay this certificate upon the table of the House, there would be any objection, at the same time, to produce the copies of any memorials received in favour of Mr. Jeremiah Smith, together with the names and addresses of the 10,000 persons who had signed them?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, such a document, if printed, would equal in size two of the largest books upon the table. He thought it would be enough to say, that he had received petitions in favour of Mr. Smith from a great variety of quarters, and he also thought it right to say that he believed those petitions could not have reached him if there had not been an active canvass in procuring signatures.

THE DUBLIN MAIL SERVICE—QUESTION.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he rose to ask the hon. Secretary of the Treasury the cause of the great delay and irregularity in the delivery of each of the three mails which should have left Dublin for London at 1 o'clock P.M. and 7 o'clock P.M. on Saturday, the 29th of July, and at 1 o'clock P.M. on Sunday, the 30th of July, as well as of similar delays which had occurred during the present Session; and whether it was the practice not to despatch letters and papers from Dublin to London on the Saturday, but to hold them over until the following Sunday?

MR. J. WILSON said, there were two mails daily from Dublin to London—on leaving Dublin at midday, the letters of which were delivered here early the following morning; and another which left in the evening, arriving in London and being delivered in the course of the next afternoon. The transmission of mails from Dublin on Saturdays would be of no public advantage, inasmuch as there was no Sunday delivery in London. The practice, therefore, was, to have no departure of mails from Dublin on Saturday, but the letters of that day left at one o'clock on Sunday by the day mail. On Sunday last the day mail, leaving Dublin at one o'clock, did not, in consequence of the unfavourable weather, arrive at Holyhead until after the departure of the train by which it should have been forwarded, so that the letters were detained until the second mail of Sunday night, and were delivered yesterday afternoon. The same occurrence had taken place only twice previously in the course of this year—the one occasioned by a similar cause, the badness of the weather, and the other in consequence of a break-down upon the Chester and Holyhead Railway.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY— QUESTION.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, he wished to ask whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to build a new gallery for the national collection of pictures; and, if so, whether the plans and designs for this gallery would be open to public competition, as in the case of the new Palace at Westminster; and whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take measures to collect the whole of the ancient pictures belonging to the nation, such as the Minden Gallery, and others recently purchased, into the National Gallery in Trafalgar Square; and whether this desirable object could be properly effected without giving notice to the Royal Academy that the apartments hitherto lent them would be required for the public service.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he believed it had been already stated in general terms by his noble Friend (Lord John Russell) that it was the intention of the Government to propose to Parliament to give them the means of building a new gallery for the national collection of pictures. With respect to the question as to whether the plans for this gallery would be open to public competition, the arrangements had not advanced so far with the consideration of the question as to enable him to answer that part of the hon. Gentleman's inquiry. With reference to the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take measures to collect the whole of the ancient pictures recently purchased into the National Gallery in Trafalgar Square, he was not able to give a very definite answer upon that subject. The pictures comprised in the Minden Gallery had been delayed for several weeks, on account of some misunderstanding connected with the persons sent to pack them, and they had not arrived a very long time in this country. At present, those pictures were deposited in one of the rooms in the basement of the National Gallery. He was not sure of the precise number, but it was somewhere about sixty. It was not intended that the whole of these pictures should be placed in the National Gallery, nor were they all worth being so placed; and the first question, therefore, was how many of these pictures were fit to become part of the national collection? That question was not yet decided, and the delay was owing to the suspended state of the question with regard to the management of the National Gallery, which had been under the consideration of the Government. Mr. Dyce, however, who himself went over to inspect this collection of pictures, was preparing a report on the subject to the trustees, giving his own opinion, which of course would form a foundation for the further consideration of the question as to the pictures which were fit to be included in the national collection. The other ancient pictures recently purchased were likewise at present in the basement rooms of the National Gallery. With respect to the question of bringing the collection of these pictures into the national collection, of course that was contemplated by the Government, and they were anxious to effect it at the earliest moment. Whether there was accommodation for these pictures in the present building in Trafalgar Square, so that the public might enjoy the sight of them, was a matter which had not yet been determined, and must depend in some degree upon the number of the pictures which would be retained. As to giving notice to the Royal Academy to vacate the portion of the building occupied by them, the Government had no intention of giving any such notice, or requiring them to vacate those premises.

THE RUSSO-DUTCH LOAN.

LORD DUDLEY STUART rose to call the attention of the House to the termination of all obligation on the part of this country, in consequence of the conduct of Russia, to continue the payments on account of the Russo-Dutch Loan; and to move the following Resolutions—

"That the Treaty of Vienna stipulates that the navigation of rivers which separate or cross the States of Powers parties to the treaty, shall be entirely free along their whole course, from the point where each of them becomes navigable to its mouth, and that each State bordering on the rivers is to be at the expense of maintaining, through the extent of its territory, the necessary works in the channel of the river, in order that no obstacle may be experienced to the navigation."

"That it appears from official documents laid before this House that Russia has, notwithstanding the reiterated remonstrances of this country, wilfully neglected, for a series of years, the duty thus imposed upon her of maintaining the necessary works in the channel of the Danube, at the mouth of the Sullna branch, thereby violating the Treaty of Vienna, and seriously injuring the commerce of this country."

"That it appears by returns laid before Parliament, that there has already been paid from the British Treasury, towards the principal and for the interest of the debt called Russo-Dutch Loan, between the years 1816 and 1855, both inclusive, the sum of 47,975,000 florins, equal to 4,110,968*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.* sterling money, and that the liquidation of the remaining part of the Loan, as stipulated by the Act 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 81, will require further annual payments from the British Treasury until the year 1915, amounting to 39,525,000 florins, equal to 3,386,989*l.* 9*s.* 2*d.* sterling money, making then the aggregate payment 7,291,666*l.*, and the average for each of the 100 years 74,978*l.* 11*s.* 6*d.*"

"That the Convention of the 16th day of November, 1831, between His Majesty the King of Great Britain and Ireland and the Emperor of All the Russias, was made to explain the stipulations of the treaty between Great Britain, Russia, and the Netherlands, signed at London on the 19th day of May, 1815; and by that Convention it was agreed by Great Britain to secure to Russia the payment of a portion of her old Dutch debt, in consideration of the general arrangements of the Congress of Vienna, to which she had given her adhesion; arrangements which remain in full force."

"That this House is therefore of opinion that Russia having withdrawn that adhesion, and those arrangements being through her act no longer in force, the payments from this country on account of that debt should be henceforth suspended."

The noble Lord proceeded to say that, in rising to move these Resolutions, he did not feel that he owed any apology to the House, except on the score of his own want of ability to do justice to the subject. He should have been well pleased had the subject fallen into the hands of some hon. Member of greater weight than himself. He had given every possible opportunity to other Members to take up the subject, for the Session was considerably advanced before he put any question to Her Majesty's Government relating to it; indeed, it was not until the 6th of May, five or six weeks after the declaration of war, that he ventured to do so; and it was not until a month after he had put the question, that, finding it was the wish of many hon. Members on both sides that the subject should be discussed, he had given notice of a Motion. He had been throughout, not only willing, but exceedingly anxious, to avoid obstructing the course of public business. The Motion was originally fixed for the 27th of June, and at the earnest request of the Government he had consented to take it off Supply, and had postponed it from time to time. The question was one which was deserving of the fullest discussion, inasmuch as it was one which affected both the pockets of the people and the character of the country. Upwards of 4,000,000*l.* sterling had been already paid on account of the Russo-Dutch Loan, and considerably more than 3,000,000*l.* remained to be paid; so that when the whole sum should have been paid, this country would have paid over to Russia little less than 7,500,000*l.* Those payments would not be completed till the year 1915, when their descendants indeed might be affected, but they themselves should all be in their graves. He knew not whether good reasons might be given for continuing those payments; he knew of none; but they owed it to the people of England to discuss the question. At a time when the people of this country were called on to make large sacrifices and submit to heavy burdens for the prosecution of the war, which they had come forward in the most spirited, creditable, and noble manner to sustain, they had a right to expect of the Government and of the House of Commons, as the guardians of the public purse, that they should inquire whether there was any real necessity for continuing to pay over large sums of money to the Power which was at war with us, and to call on them to state fairly, explicitly, and carefully what was the nature of those reasons. A further reason for bringing forward the Motion was the conduct of the noble Lord the President of the Council, who, in reply to a question he (Lord Dudley Stuart) had put to him on a previous occasion, gave one of those answers which Ministers were too apt to give when disagreeable or inconvenient questions were put to them, and the noble Lord not less than any of his colleagues. The answer, while appearing to reflect upon the person putting the question, in reality supplied no information whatever. He (Lord D. Stuart) asked the noble Lord whether, while we were at war with Russia, it was the intention of the Government to continue these payments, which would in point of fact supply to Russia the means of carrying on the war against us; and the noble Lord replied that it was the intention of the Government to adhere to the faith of treaties. He (Lord D. Stuart) thought that any other answer would have been more becoming and satisfactory. Had he said that he had given his serious attention to the subject since the breaking out of the war, and since the occurrence of the circumstances upon which the opinion that the payments ought not to be continued was grounded—or had he said that he would do so, and had afterwards given a deliberate, explicit, and intelligent answer—there might have been no occasion for the present Motion. But Ministers would never give their attention to these subjects unless they were forced upon them by the House of Commons; and hence the necessity of Motions like this. The noble Lord's answer certainly enunciated a very honourable and a very creditable sentiment—the determination to adhere to good faith; but he must beg to remind the noble Lord that he had no monopoly of that sentiment. He (Lord D. Stuart) was quite as anxious as the noble Lord could possibly be to keep faith with all. The perfidy of others could be no reason for our own dishonesty. But the question was, were we really bound in good faith to make those payments? By all means let us keep good faith with our enemies: even with a Power so hateful as Russia; but he believed that we were not bound to make these payments; and if not bound to make them, then the Government was bound not to make them. A proclamation had lately been published, in the Hanse Towns and other ports of the Baltic, warning all English subjects that if they advanced any money to the Emperor of Russia during the war they would be guilty of high treason; and in his (Lord D. Stuart's) opinion, if Ministers paid money to the Russian Government without being obliged to do so—without the faith of treaties requiring it—they would be in the same position, and would be guilty of high treason. He hoped to convince the House that we were not bound by good faith to make these payments; he did not wish for any one's vote who was not convinced that there was no obligation of good faith or honour in the matter; and if it could be proved that such an obligation existed, he would at once abandon the Motion. He wished to disabuse their minds of the notion that by withholding these payments we could be violating good faith towards individuals. The fact was that the public faith was in no degree engaged to the creditors—to those who held this stock. This loan was not contracted by England, nor guaranteed by England. It was contracted during the last century, about 1798 or 1799, by Russia, upon her own credit. It was called in the treaty of 1815, "her old Dutch debt," and England had never had anything to do with guaranteeing it. All England had done had been to agree to pay to Russia some equivalent for the interest of a portion of it, upon certain conditions. The 4th Article of the treaty under which these payments were made was to this effect: "The Russian Government shall continue, as heretofore, to be security to the creditors for the whole of the said loan, and shall be charged with the administration of the same, the Governments of the King of the Netherlands and of His Britannic Majesty remaining liable and bound to the Government of His Imperial Majesty each for the punctual discharge as above of the respective proportions of the said charge." This Article of the treaty proved that the British Government was not liable to the creditors, the holders of stock. That the creditors themselves did not consider the loan guaranteed by this country, was evident from the fact that though this was a five per cent stock, the price at Amsterdam was 98 or 99; while if it were guaranteed by this country there was no reason why it should not be considerably more than 100. And, no doubt, if these payments were withdrawn, the creditors would not suffer in the smallest degree. There were no such creditors in England; the stock was entirely unknown here. He had sent to the Stock Exchange to inquire about it; they knew nothing of it; its existence was almost denied; and he was obliged to write over to Amsterdam to obtain any information on the subject.

if any was held here, there was no apprehension that, if we discontinued these payments, Russia would refuse the dividend to the creditors. She could no more allege our refusal as a reason for doing so than she could rely on the general expenses of the war, or the blockade we carried on upon her coast. He should have no difficulty in believing that Russia might be capable of any enormity or any dishonesty; but he did not believe she would do a thing which would be inimical and ruinous to her own interests; for she was a country constantly requiring loans, and if she withheld the payment of dividends on any such ground as this, she would strike a deadly blow at her own credit, and would never be able to obtain another loan. If there were any breach of faith—which he utterly denied—in withdrawing these payments, it would not be a breach of faith as regarded individuals, but, if at all, as regarded the Russian Government.

Now, to ascertain whether we were bound in good faith to continue these payments, we must go back to the treaties made at the conclusion of the great war in 1814. By the Treaty of Chaumont, between the four Allied Powers, England, Austria, Russia, and Prussia, signed on the 1st of March, 1814, those Powers bound themselves to maintain an army of 600,000 men to carry on the war. That treaty led to the abdication of Fontainebleau, also to the withdrawal of the French troops from Holland, and ultimately to the union of Belgium with Holland; which was finally settled by the Treaty of Paris, signed on the 30th of May, 1814. Then came the question how the expenses of the war were to be defrayed; and it was arranged that all the States which had benefited by the war should contribute to those expenses. Holland was one of these countries, she not only having regained the territories taken from her, but having acquired a very considerable accession of territory, the whole of Belgium. Subsequent treaties showed that the quota which Holland was to contribute was fixed at 50,000,000 of florins, or, as I will call it for convenience, 5,000,000*l.* sterling. Then a Convention was signed between England and Holland on the 13th August, 1814, by which it was arranged that, in consideration of Holland ceding to England certain colonies which had been taken by France, and retaken by the arms of England, England should make certain payments to Holland. If England had acted after the fashion of Russia at the Congress of Vienna, she would have insisted upon the uti possi- deits, and have kept all the possessions she had seized without making any compensation whatever. Instead of that she took quite another course; she entered into one of the most improvident, extravagant, and profligate bargains that was ever made by any State, and agreed to pay for those colonies—the Cape of Good Hope, Demerara, Essequibo, and Berbice—so many millions of money, whereas they were not worth so many hundreds of thousands, perhaps not so many shillings. Those colonies produced us nothing except the Cape, which certainly had produced something—a long, dangerous, difficult, and bloody war, that cost this country 2,000,000*l.* There were great debates in both Houses when these payments were settled; Lord Grey declared that he considered these colonies utterly worthless, and that, had he been a Minister, he would not have accepted them at a gift. Nevertheless, we had entered into the bargain, made the agreement, and as honest men must stand to it. That Convention settled that 1,000,000*l.* sterling was to be paid to Holland, and should be paid over under the authority of the treaty of the 30th of May, 1814, to Sweden; that 2,000,000*l.* more were to be paid by this country to Holland, to be employed, in conjunction with an equal sum, in improving the defences of the Low Countries; and that a further sum, not then defined, should be paid, but which was not to exceed 3,000,000*l.* on the part of England, and which was to be laid out in such a manner as might be agreed upon between England and Holland, and their allies, and this also for the benefit of Holland. Then came a new transaction. Russia was unwilling to accede to the arrangements of the Congress of Vienna. Probably the difficulty arose with regard to provisions for maintaining the nationality of Poland, the object of such sincere regard to Lord Castlereagh, and which had been observed with such scrupulous good faith by the Emperor of Russia. However that might be, the Allied Powers agreed to purchase the consent of Russia by waiving in her favour their claims upon Holland. Russia thereupon withdrew her objections, agreed to the Treaty of Vienna, and she got the Dutch contribution to the expenses of the war, or rather got the sanction of the four Powers to her claim. In plain words she got 5,000,000*l.* sterling for agreeing to adhere to the Treaty of Vienna. To carry this plan into effect, England, Holland, and Russia, entered into a joint Convention on the 19th of May, 1815, by which Holland agreed to pay to Russia 2,500,000*l.*, the half of her quota towards the expenses of the war; the other half she agreed to pay in another manner. Under the treaty of 1814 she had a claim upon England to an amount not to exceed 3,000,000*l.* Holland agreed, instead of paying the remaining half of her quota to the Allied Powers, to place this sum at their disposal; and, pursuant to an arrangement with them, England bound herself to pay this sum to Russia, instead of to Holland. Thus Holland was completely paid for her colonies; 3,000,000*l.* she received down, and the quota actually payable by her to Russia was reduced from 5,000,000*l.* to 2,500,000*l.*; thus benefiting her in the whole by 5,500,000*l.* Therefore, no question could arise as to England keeping good faith with regard to Holland. Then, in what situation were we with regard to Russia? She was to receive the whole of the quota to be paid by Holland for the war; this was by agreement with the four Powers. Without this agreement she would not have had a right to the whole, only to a proportion of it; but it was arranged that she should receive the whole—half from Holland and half from England—on condition of her agreeing to the arrangements of the Treaty of Vienna. The particular mode of payment was this: Russia had fifteen years previously contracted a loan in Holland in the usual way, through the house of Hope and Co., of Amsterdam. Holland and England each undertook to pay to the agent of the Russian Government in Holland a sum equal to the interest of a portion of the loan—about 5,000,000*l.* sterling. England and Holland were each to pay one-half of the interest on this amount, together with certain annual instalments, in liquidation of the principal. Russia was thus to be benefited to the extent of 5,000,000*l.* sterling. Those payments were to extend over a period of 100 years. Why was this? Was it not clear from this circumstance that they had reference to something that was to be done by Russia, not only at that time, but something that Russia was to continue to do for the next century? That was, Russia was to continue, for at least 100 years, to adhere to the general arrangements of the Treaty of Vienna. Another condition, and a very important one, was attached to these payments—the continuance of the union of Belgium and Holland. The 5th Article provided as follows—

"It is hereby understood and agreed between the high contracting Parties that the said payments on the part of their Majesties the King of the Netherlands and the King of Great Britain, as aforesaid, shall cease and determine, should the possession and sovereignty (which God forbid) of the Belgick Provinces at any time pass or be severed from the dominions of His Majesty the King of the Netherlands previous to the complete liquidation of the same."

In 1830, events arose which occasioned the separation of Belgium from Holland; and when that took place the payments could no longer be made conformably to the letter of the Convention. But as it was felt that Russia had in no degree been instrumental in producing this change of circumstances, but on the contrary, as it was notorious that the separation was extremely disagreeable to Russia, and that Russia had even gone the length of offering to employ an army of 60,000 men to prevent Belgium being separated from Holland, it was thought that it would be extremely unfair and unjust to take advantage of those circumstances in order to withhold the payment from Russia—though certainly, according to the letter of the treaty, that payment might have been withheld, and, in point of fact, could not be continued. A new Convention was accordingly entered into between Russia and England, which stipulated that the payments, notwithstanding the new circumstances of Belgium and Holland, should be continued. Great debates arose on the subject in both Houses of Parliament, and all the most distinguished men of that day took part in them. It was objected by some that the Government was not justified in making these payments under the new Convention until it had received the sanction of Parliament; and Lord Grenville, then the Auditor of the Exchequer, felt this so strongly that he refused to issue the money until he received a sufficient authority. The Government thought they had a right to continue the payments without any Act of Parliament; but at length, after very long, stormy, and acrimonious debates, Lord Althorp, the Chancellor of the Exchequer of that day, acknowledged that he was wrong; the payments were suspended, and a Bill was brought into Parliament and received the Royal Assent sanctioning their renewal. The Convention then entered into was signed on the 16th November, 1831; it was made to explain the original treaties, and a correspondence was also laid upon the table of the House which was intended to explain the explanation. The Convention was as follows—

Lord D. Stuart

"Their Majesties the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the Emperor of All the Russias, considering that the events which have occurred in the United Kingdom of the Netherlands, since the year 1830, have rendered it necessary that the Courts of Great Britain and Russia should examine the stipulations of their Convention of the 19th May, 1815, as well as of the additional Article annexed thereto; considering that such examination has led the two high contracting Parties to the conclusion that complete agreement does not exist between the letter and the spirit of that Convention, when regarded in connection with the circumstances which have attended the separation that has taken place between the two principal divisions of the United Kingdom of the Netherlands; but that, on referring to the object of the abovementioned Convention of the 19th of May, 1815, it appears that that object was to afford to Great Britain a guarantee that Russia would, on all questions concerning Belgium, identify her policy with that which the Court of London had deemed the best adapted for the maintenance of a just balance of power in Europe; and, on the other hand, to secure to Russia the payment of a portion of her old Dutch debt, in consideration of the general arrangements of the Congress of Vienna, to which she had given her adhesion, arrangements which remain in full force: their said Majesties being desirous at the present moment, that the same principles should continue to govern their relations with each other, and that the special tie which the Convention of the 19th of May, 1815, had formed between the two Courts, should be maintained, have for this purpose named as their Plenipotentiaries—and so on.

"Article 1. In virtue of the considerations above specified, His Britannic Majesty engages to recommend to his Parliament to enable him to undertake to continue, on his part, the payments stipulated in the Convention of the 19th of May, 1815, according to the mode, and until the completion of the sum fixed for Great Britain in the said Convention."

Some very remarkable documents had also been laid on the table of the House, the chief of which was the statement of the agents of Russia herself on this subject—her own explanation of the treaty. The Russian Plenipotentiary, in 1831, addressed the following statement to Viscount Palmerston—

"The actual separation of Belgium from Holland has not changed the position in which Russia and Great Britain stood towards each other, at the time of the signature of the Convention of the 19th of May, 1815. Of this, the preamble of that Act affords the best proof. It is therein stated, that His Majesty the King of the Netherlands being desirous, upon the final union of the Belgic Provinces with Holland, to render to the Allied Powers who were parties to the treaty concluded at Chaumont on the 1st March, 1814, a suitable return for the heavy expenses incurred by them in delivering the said territories from the power of the enemy; and the said Powers having, in consideration of arrangements made with each other, mutually agreed to waive their several pretensions under this head in favour of His Majesty the Emperor of All the Russias, His said Majesty the King of the Netherlands has thereupon resolved to proceed immediately to execute with His Imperial Majesty a Convention to the following effect, to which His Britannic Majesty agrees to be a party, in pursuance of engagements taken by His said Majesty with the King of the Netherlands, in a Convention signed at London on the 13th August, 1814.* It was impossible to define more clearly the position of the three contracting Courts. The King of the Netherlands charged himself with the payment of the expenses incurred in the deliverance of the Provinces, the possession of which had devolved upon him. Russia, Great Britain, Austria, and Prussia, the Allied Powers who were parties to the Treaty of Chaumont, in consideration, therefore, not of the union of the Belgian Provinces to Holland,* but of arrangements concluded amongst themselves, renounced all claims to the repayment of the expenses incurred in the deliverance of the said Provinces in favour of one of these Powers exclusively—namely, of Russia. Finally, Great Britain consented to become one of the contracting parties, in consequence of previous engagements made by her towards his Majesty the King of the Netherlands, on the 13th of August, 1814. Now, what were the arrangements between the Powers who were parties to the Treaty of Chaumont at the period at which the Convention of 19th of May, 1815, was concluded at London? *They were the general arrangements of the Congress of Vienna, which had just then terminated. In consideration of the facilities which Russia afforded to these arrangements, her allies ceded to her all the pecuniary pretensions to which the deliverance of the Belgian Provinces had given rise. It necessarily follows that these facilities were real and important, as they were made the ground of her liberation from a considerable debt. And what were the prior engagements of the 13th August, 1814, which caused Great Britain to become a contracting Party to the Convention of 19th May, 1815? They were the engagements which we find in the first of the Additional Articles of the Convention signed the 13th August, 1814, between Great Britain and the Netherlands. This article provides, amongst other engagements of Great Britain, 'to bear equally with Holland such further charges as may be agreed upon between the said high contracting Parties and their allies, towards the final and satisfactory settlement of the Low Countries in union with Holland, and under the dominion of the House of Orange, not exceeding in the whole the sum of 3,000,000*l.* to be defrayed by Great Britain.'* In consideration of the above engagements, the Cape of Good Hope, Demerara, Essequibo, and Berbice, were ceded to Great Britain. Great Britain had then, on the 13th of August, 1814, contracted an unconditional obli-

tion of sharing with Holland, to the extent of 3,000,000*l.* sterling, the charges which burdened the future kingdom of the Netherlands; and this obligation was not gratuitous, for, in exchange, Great Britain obtained the cession of the Cape of Good Hope, Demerara, and Essequibo, and the Island of Berbice. The Convention of the 19th May, 1815, was, as its preamble proves, as cited above, the effect of this transaction. *From whence it results, that Russia obtained the cession of the pretensions which the signing Powers of the Treaty of Chaumont had to put forward at the expense of the prince who should possess Belgium, in consideration of the divers arrangements that it had made with those Powers at the Congress of Vienna, and that England contracted the obligation of satisfying these pretensions to the extent of 25,000,000 of Dutch florins (about 2,000,000*l.), in consideration of the cession that had been made of the four colonies. The divers arrangements of the Congress of Vienna, by which Russia acquired the pretensions above mentioned, remain in all their force, notwithstanding the present position of Belgium. Upon what ground, then, could Russia be deprived of the compensation at which those arrangements have been valued to her?"

The Russian Plenipotentiary thus sums up this most remarkable and very able memoir:—

"After having proved, first, that the case in which the effect of that Convention would cease has not occurred; secondly, that the arrangements by which Russia rendered facilities which had given her the benefit of the said Convention still exist; thirdly, that Great Britain is in possession of the colonies which she acquired in taking upon herself the obligations which the Convention of 19th May, 1815, impose upon her—the Russian Plenipotentiaries would think that they did not form a just idea of the principles and of the fidelity which always preside over the acts of the Government of His Britannic Majesty, if they were not firmly convinced that the payments established by the Convention, of which they invoke the spirit and the letter, will be made in future as they have been hitherto made."

After this it was impossible for Russia to deny that the condition of these payments was her continued adherence to the general arrangements of the Treaty of Vienna. She might, indeed, and probably—with that regard to truth so aptly portrayed by the noble Lord the Home Secretary in reference to recent transactions—would, in the face of facts, deny any violation on her part of the Treaty of Vienna; but she could not possibly deny that the consideration for which this money was paid to her was a continued adherence to the Treaty of Vienna, that being admitted in documents signed by her own Plenipotentiaries. He did not think this had ever been denied in the British Parliament, indeed it had been admitted in a long and interesting debate which took place some time ago on the subject. In 1847 his hon. Friend the Member for Montrose (Mr.

* "The treaties prove the correctness of this assertion. It was by the Treaty of Paris of May 30, 1814, that the union of Belgium to Holland was irrevocably decided upon. It did not, and could not, therefore, give rise to any discussion at the Congress of Vienna. Difficulties arose at this Congress on other points. Russia abandoned its demands on those points, and to compensate her for her sacrifices, the Allies resolved to facilitate to her the payment of her ancient Dutch debt."

Hume) moved a Resolution identical with that which he now proposed to lay before the House—with this difference only, that on that occasion his hon. Friend based his Motion on the annexation of Cracow, which was a gross violation of the Treaty of Vienna, while, in this instance, the violation of the treaty consisted in the obstruction of the navigation of the Danube. In that debate, which lasted three days, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire and the late Lord George Bentinck endeavoured to maintain by very ingenious, but in his (Lord D. Stuart's) opinion very fallacious arguments, that the annexation of Cracow formed no violation of the Treaty of Vienna; but here there could be no doubt that a violation of the treaty had been committed, and therefore if he did not obtain the right hon. Gentleman's vote, at all events he hoped he should not meet with his opposition. The Motion of the hon. Member for Montrose was also resisted by the noble Lord the Leader of the House, and he gave a great many reasons against it—reasons founded upon policy—reasons founded upon expediency—reasons founded upon the want of dignity in England resisting the annexation of Cracow, by discontinuing these payments, unless she were prepared to go further and actually to declare war against Russia—but the noble Lord had only one reason to give against the argument that these payments depended upon the adherence of Russia to the general arrangements of the Treaty of Vienna. The noble Lord said that Russia had not violated the arrangement contained in the Treaty of Vienna as regarded the union of Holland and Belgium—a reason that, in fact, amounted to this: that the noble Lord considered the general arrangements of the Treaty of Vienna should be held to mean not a general arrangement, but a particular arrangement, having reference only to Holland and Belgium. But that could not be, because the Convention of 1831 particularly stated “the general arrangements of the Treaty of Vienna, which remain in full force.” Now, the arrangements of the Treaty of Vienna with regard to Holland and Belgium assuredly did not then remain in full force, because they had been entirely abrogated and swept away; and the very thing which made it necessary to enter into a new Convention on the subject was that all those arrangements had absolutely terminated. The noble Lord the Secretary of State for the

Home Department, who was then Foreign Secretary, had also a great many reasons to give against the Motion; but, like his noble colleague, he had only one reason to state against the position that these payments depended upon the adherence of Russia to the general arrangements of the Treaty of Vienna. His reason was not the same as that of his noble colleague. He said that he could not conceive that the violation of a single article of the treaty would be sufficient to justify us in withholding payment of the money. Now, he must say that the noble Lord, with all his great ability and his perfect familiarity with treaties and international law, was certainly very hard pressed when he had no other reason to give than that, because he believed the opinion which the noble Lord expressed—that the violation of one article of a treaty was not sufficient to vitiate the whole arrangement, was entirely at variance with that of all the great authorities upon international law, and of all jurists who had touched upon the subject. For instance, in Vattel's “Law of Nations,” book ii. chap. xiii. sec. 202, he found this passage, bearing upon this very point, namely:—

“We cannot consider the several articles of the same treaty as so many distinct and independent treaties; for though we do not see any immediate connection between some of those articles, they are all connected by this common relation, namely, that the contracting Powers have agreed to some of them in consideration of the others, and by way of compensation. I would, perhaps, never have consented to this article, if my ally had not granted me another, which, in its own nature, has no relation to it. Everything, therefore, which is comprehended in the same treaty is of the same force and nature as a reciprocal promise, unless where a formal exception is made to the contrary. Grotius very properly observes, that ‘Every article of a treaty carries with it a condition, by the non-performance of which the treaty is wholly cancelled.’”

Again, in “Wildman's International Law,” vol. i. page 174, he found this passage:—

“A treaty is an entire contract. All its articles are dependent, and have the force of conditions, so that the violation of any one of them is a violation of the whole treaty, and renders it voidable at the option of the party injured.”

It was natural, however, that Ministers of State and diplomatists should allow their opinions, to a certain degree, to be biased by political considerations. We must always expect that; but he would quote an opinion on this subject of a learned gentleman, who was considered to be a great authority in these matters. It was a professional opinion, given professionally upon this very subject. He referred to Dr. Addams, who had given this opinion upon this very treaty:—

"It is obvious that upon the separation of Holland and the Netherlands, consequent upon the revolution of September, 1830, it ceased to be obligatory on Great Britain to make any further payments on account of the Russian-Dutch loan, in virtue of the Convention of May, 1815—according to the letter of that Convention—though it was said or intimated that obligation still subsisted, according to the spirit of the Convention. But whether Russia could or could not, founding upon the spirit, as against the letter of the Convention, have justly insisted on such further payments, is a question that merged, upon the execution of the Convention of November, 1831, between Great Britain and Russia, and it is upon this latter Convention that it is now obligatory on Great Britain (if at all) to make any such further payments. Now, in the Convention of November, 1831 (executed by the two Powers), the object of the Convention of 1815 is recited to have been to afford Great Britain a guarantee that Russia would observe a certain policy on all questions respecting Belgium, on the one hand, and, on the other, to secure to Russia the payment of a portion of her old Dutch debt, in consideration of the general arrangements of the Congress of Vienna, to which she had given her adhesion, arrangements which (says the Convention) still remain in full force. And it is in virtue of this special consideration (Convention of 1831, Article 1) that Great Britain undertakes to continue on her part the payments stipulated in the Convention of May, 1815. It seems to me that the phrase 'arrangements which still remain in full force' pretty plainly implies that if such arrangements had not remained in full force, at any rate through any fault or delinquency on the part of Russia, Great Britain would have declined to enter into such latter Convention. And the language of the whole Convention, according to the true interpretation of it, in my humble judgment, is identical in import with this, that Great Britain undertakes to continue the payments in consideration of Russia maintaining, or by reason that she does maintain, these general arrangements of the Congress of Vienna, to which she was originally a party at the time of the holding of such Congress in 1815. And this being so, it also seems to me that a breach or violation of those general arrangements in any material part, though the fault or delinquency of Russia, plainly releases Great Britain from that continuing obligation which she took upon herself, under the Convention of November, 1831, in consideration or by reason of Russia maintaining such general arrangements."

Well, now the noble Lord spoke of there being only one article of the Treaty of Vienna which Russia had violated; but so far from that being the case, it would hardly be too much to say that Russia had violated almost every article of the treaty. She had violated the first article, which gave a constitution to Poland; in fact she never adhered to it, but took the very first opportunity of entirely overthrowing that constitution. The conduct of Russia, however, with regard to Poland, was too well known for it to be necessary that he should dwell upon it. It had been remonstrated against by this country, on the ground that it was a violation of the Treaty of Vienna. Then there was her conduct with regard to Craoow, which had also been made the subject of a formal protest on the part of this country; and now he would show that there had been another serious and systematic violation of that treaty since this subject was discussed last in the House by Russia, with regard to the navigation of the Danube. There had been a wilful, deliberate, and long-continued departure from the stipulations of the Treaty of Vienna with regard to that river, in defiance of reiterated remonstrances addressed to her by the Powers who were parties to that treaty, and to the palpable and serious detriment of British trade and commerce. That proposition was abundantly proved by the correspondence which had been laid on the table, and to which he was about briefly to refer. He might observe in the first instance that the correspondence extended over a space of four years—namely, from the autumn of 1849, down to within a few months of the breaking out of the war between Russia and Turkey. The first despatch was dated October 17, 1849, and was addressed by Lord Palmerston to Lord Bloomfield as follows—

"My Lord,—I have to acquaint your Lordship that I approve of the representation which, as reported in his despatch of the 2nd instant, Mr. Buchanan made to M. Seniavine relative to the Sulina mouth of the Danube; and I have to instruct you to point out to the Russian Minister that what is required for the purposes of commerce is, not only that the accumulating shoals at that mouth of the Danube should be dredged, so as to deepen the channel, but also that the remains of vessels which have been there wrecked should be removed, it being stated that some of these wrecks still remain in the water-way, and form dangerous obstructions to the navigation. I am, &c.

(Signed) "PALMERSTON."

The reply was in these terms—

"St. Petersburg, Oct. 30, 1849.

"My Lord,—At an interview which I had yesterday with Count Nesselrode, I stated to his Excellency, in conformity with your Lordship's instructions, the wishes of Her Majesty's Government respecting the removal of the impediments to commerce which now exist in the Sulina mouth of the Danube, and I especially observed to the Chancellor that great advantage would result to the navigation of that part of the river from the removal of the wrecks which now obstruct the passage. Count Nesselrode replied that orders had been given to the local authorities which he hoped would in the end prove satisfactory to Her Majesty's Government, but that all that was required could not be effected as speedily as we seemed to expect. I rejoined that your Lordship had frequently, and even long before I came to Russia, called the attention of the Imperial Government to the defective state of the navigation at the Sulina mouth, and therefore it was not to be wondered at if we feared further procrastination. I then left with the Chancellor a copy of your Lordship's despatch of the 17th instant, conceiving that it might be advisable to record the wishes of Her Majesty's Government on this subject in a more formal manner than could be done in a mere conversation.—I have, &c.,

So that, in 1849, it was made a subject of accusation against Russia. The next despatch to which he would refer was addressed by Vice Consul Cunningham to Sir Stratford Canning, and it was as follows—

"Galatz, Sept. 14, 1850.

"Sir,—The steamer from Constantinople has arrived, and I have informed myself particularly regarding the depth of water on the bar of Sulina; it is reported to be decreasing, and that there is now less than eight feet Venetian, or very little over nine feet English. There can be no doubt that it is very easy to keep the water on the Sulina bar at fourteen feet English, by merely stirring the mud. While the Turks had possession of the Sulina, they kept the water on the bar at fourteen feet English, and, it is said, even fourteen feet Venetian, or sixteen and a half feet English, without incurring the slightest expense, by merely making every vessel going out of the river drag a heavy iron rake after her over the bar. These rakes still exist at Sulina, or at least did so some years ago, as I myself have seen them there. To my knowledge, fifteen years ago, English vessels went out of the Danube, drawing between fourteen and fifteen feet water. It is also to my knowledge that about ten years ago nearly 100 vessels of different nations were detained in Sulina waiting an opportunity of going out, and the masters agreed among themselves to endeavour to deepen the bar; whereon the boats and crews of all the vessels went one day to the bar, and, merely with boat-hooks, or what else they had on board of the vessels, they in one day considerably deepened the bar—I cannot at present say to what extent; my impression is that it was to nearly a foot. It is quite certain that nothing is wanted but to keep stirring the mud; the only question is, who is to stir the mud, and who is to pay the expense. The expense, however, cannot be great. As to what the Russian captain of a steamer pretends to have discovered, that the bar is of stone, and not of mud, it is quite certain there cannot be any stone within sixteen feet English of the surface of the water; once that depth is obtained, it is time to consider whether a greater depth is required, and a charge of gunpowder, properly applied, will easily make twenty feet of water. The difference of nine feet on the bar of Sulina, in comparison of eleven, will cause an expense to British trade and shipping of at least 30,000*l.* sterling this autumn.—I have, &c. (signed)

"CHARLES CUNNINGHAM."

Lord D. Stuart

The Vice Consul also inclosed a table, stating the number of vessels, British and others, which departed from Galatz during a series of years, and from this table it appeared that in 1843 there were seven British vessels cleared out, while in 1849 the number had increased to 128, and the number of vessels of all nations to 297. The number of tons in 1843 was 1,432; in 1849 it had reached to 85,370. See how immensely this trade was increasing, and what great importance it would have been to the commerce of this country, if it had not been the policy of the Emperor of Russia to cause the mouth of the Danube to be obstructed, in order, as much as possible, to turn the course of trade towards his own port of Odessa. The next despatch he would read was from Vice Consul Lloyd to Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, dated 4th June, 1853, which contained this passage—

"Vessels outward bound, which had lightened to ten feet water, and had been, during the contrary wind, accumulating at Sulina, waiting for the first change of wind to go out, have found themselves unable to proceed, all the lighters being engaged. This has happened to a remarkable extent the last few days; there had been ten feet water, as usual, on the bar; but the wind being easterly, the vessels accumulated at Sulina; on a change of wind, there was found to be but eight feet water, and the Austrian weekly steamer from Constantinople, with goods and passengers for the Danube, having arrived off the bar last Thursday, the 2nd instant, was unable to enter the river, the passengers having nearly all landed here, unable to proceed, and greatly embarrassed for want of accommodation, the steamer having discharged her cargo into vessels employed as lighters, but still unable to pass the bar. Yesterday, the 3rd, the wind shifted to the west, and the bar was tolerably smooth, but there was only eight and a half English feet upon it; there is an immense number of vessels here outward bound; indeed, the river is crowded with them for a couple of miles, and about five and twenty English vessels in the number, none lightened sufficiently to go out, and many not at all, and every lighter in the place, or free vessel engaged as lighter, already taken up."

On the 15th July, 1853, Sir H. Seymour writes in these terms to the Earl of Clarendon—

"In obedience to the orders contained in your Lordship's despatch of the 5th instant, I have taken the earliest opportunity which presented itself for representing to Count Nesselrode the grievous injury inflicted upon English navigation, as upon that of other countries, by the neglect of the ordinary precautions necessary for clearing away the obstacles which are allowed to obstruct the Sulina pass. A few references to the despatch addressed by Mr. Vice Consul Lloyd were sufficient to establish the urgency of a remedy for the evil complained of being provided by the Russian Government, and I must say that the statement appeared to produce considerable effect upon the Chancellor, and his Excellency assured me that the matter should be carefully examined. I have thought it advisable to communicate Mr. Vice Consul Lloyd's despatches to Baron Lebzelter, the Austrian mission having been repeatedly enjoined to make representations upon the subject, of such deep interest to all countries trading on the Danube."

So that it would be seen that not only British interests, but the interests of other countries, had been injured by these improper proceedings of Russia. Well, now, having shown beyond all dispute that the Danube had been obstructed, it remained for him to show that the obstruction was a violation of the Treaty of Vienna, and for that purpose he must refer shortly to the treaty itself. There were several articles in the Treaty of Vienna referring to rivers, and their provisions were these—

"Art. 108. The Powers whose States are separated or crossed by the same navigable river, engage to regulate, by common consent, all that regards its navigation.—Art. 109. The navigation of the rivers along their whole course referred to in the preceding article from the point where each of them becomes navigable to its mouth, shall be entirely free.—Art. 113. Each State bordering on the rivers is to be at the expense of keeping in good repair the towing paths which pass through its territory, and of maintaining the necessary works through the same extent in the channels of the river in order that no obstacle may be experienced to the navigation."

It was perfectly true that at the time this treaty was signed the Danube did not come under the description which was here given of rivers. At that time the Sulina mouth of the Danube was not in the possession of Russia; but although the noble Earl at the head of the Government had stated in another place that Russia, by the Treaty of Adrianople, had acquired no territorial possessions in Europe whatever, it was, nevertheless, true that, by the Treaty of Adrianople, she did acquire possession of the Delta of the Danube, which she had not before. That was a position of no trifling importance, because it had enabled Russia to work injury to our trade; and Russia had otherwise reaped the fruits of her bad faith, because she had rendered the river impassable at its mouth, so that England had not been able, until very lately, to send a vessel of war up the Danube, which, if she had done, she might have given important co-operation to Turkey in the campaign against Russia, and might possibly have prevented the Russian army from passing into Bulgaria at all. But although the Sulina mouth did not come under the description he had read, it had, nevertheless, been held by cabinets and diplomatists that these articles were of so general a nature, that they must be held to be applicable to any river which might, in the course of time, come under the description given in these articles. This also showed that the arrangements of the Treaty of Vienna as to rivers were general arrangements, since they were to take effect not only at the time the treaty was made, but in all times to come. If he wanted any support for that opinion, he had only to refer to a despatch written upon this subject by the noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he was at the Foreign Office. The noble Lord stated in distinct terms his opinion upon the subject in a despatch dated October 4, 1850, and addressed by him to Lord Bloomfield, as follows—

"Foreign Office, October 4, 1850.

"My Lord—With reference to my despatch of the 2nd instant, instructing you to remind the Russian Government of its promise to take measures for clearing the Sulina channel of the Danube, I inclose, for your Lordship's information, a copy of a further despatch from the British Vice Consul at Galatz, stating the injury which the present state of that channel occasions to commerce, and the measures by which, at a trifling expense, the channel might be deepened. I have to instruct your Lordship to communicate to the Russian Government the substance of the inclosed despatch, and to express the earnest hope of Her Majesty's Government that the Russian Government will feel that it is not right that its possession of the mouth of the river, the navigation of which ought, by the stipulations of the Treaty of Vienna, to be free and accessible to the commerce of all nations, should become the means of obstructing the navigation of that river, and of virtually shutting out from it a large portion of the commerce which would otherwise pass up and down its channel.—I am, &c.

"St. Petersburg, October 22, 1850.

"In pursuance of the instructions contained in your Lordship's despatches of the 2nd and of the 4th instant, respecting the obstructions in the Sulina channel of the Danube, I last week drew the attention of M. Séniavine to the dilatory proceedings of the Russian authorities in Bessarabia in carrying out the intention which the Imperial Government had so frequently expressed to me of deepening the channel and rendering it navigable for vessels of large burthen. I read to his Excellency your Lordship's two above-mentioned despatches, and begged him especially to remark the severe loss to which our trade had been subjected."

that the Government of England had always maintained that the conduct of Russia with regard to the Danube was a violation of the Treaty of Vienna, while the Russian diplomatists themselves had never attempted to contest that position; it was clear, then, that they could not, or they would have been the first to say—"Although we are ready to do what you desire, we must at the same time protest against the reasons which you give for calling upon us to do so." But they did not say that, and therefore he was justified in contending that the position he laid down was admitted by Russia as well as by the British Government. But, after all, those with whom he had to deal were Her Majesty's Government; and the way he put the matter to the Government was this—"How can you, when you state that what Russia has done is a violation of the Treaty of Vienna, how can you take the money of the people of England and give it to Russia when it is only payable to her upon the condition that she shall adhere to the Treaty of Vienna?" That was the case he had to put before the House, though he thought there were other reasons that might be urged for withholding this money from Russia. It might be justified on two other grounds. He thought, firstly, that inasmuch as Russia had failed in her duty towards us, we should be perfectly justified by the doctrine of reprisals, even if we were at peace, in withholding the money; we should be perfectly justified in saying to Russia, "You have not done your duty with regard to the Danube, and thereby you have injured our commerce and inflicted disadvantages upon us. Without reference, therefore, to the special conditions of the treaty, we will make reprisals upon you by not paying you money which you are entitled to under this treaty." That course would be perfectly justifiable, because the highest authorities upon international law allowed, that the breaking of one treaty was quite sufficient to justify the violation of another by the country first aggrieved. Secondly, it might be perfectly well urged that the war was a sufficient excuse for withholding the money, because it abrogated all treaties. It was perfectly true that in the general treaty of 1815 there was an article expressly providing that these payments should continue, even in a state of war; but that which legalised these payments was not the treaty of 1815, but, as stated in the opinion of Dr. Addams, it was the subsequent Convention of 1831, and that Convention did not repeat the article about continuing the payments in a time of war. These two reasons ought to be taken into consideration, but he confessed that he did not wish to rest his case upon them; he wished rather to argue it as if we were at peace, and upon grounds irrespective of the war, namely, upon the ground that the conditions upon which we stipulated to pay the money not having been fulfilled, we were conscientiously justified in withholding it. Now, he was supposed to be a most violent and most reckless enemy of Russia. Some people, indeed, went the length of supposing that there was nothing he would not do in order to carry out his hostility to that Power. Well, it was perfectly true that he entertained strong convictions on the subject of Russia; and he had never concealed them; on the contrary, he had spent the whole of his life in proclaiming them, and the opinions which he held had come very much to be entertained by the country and the noble Lord the President of the Council; at the same time, he had no wish to take any unfair advantage of Russia, nor did he wish to recommend any course to be taken towards her which was not strictly founded in equity and justice. He had shown that the claims of Russia to this money arose out of the circumstances of her allies waiving certain of their rights, and that upon the faith of that surrender, Russia obtained her claim to this money, but the conditions upon which she obtained it being violated, her claim had disappeared, and so disappearing, the claim, or rather the money, reverted to those who were originally entitled to it. These were the four Powers who signed the Treaty of Chaumont; no doubt Russia was one of these, and on that account she might have a claim to a portion of the money, though not to the whole. If that were so, he should be quite prepared to agree that the money should be invested until such time as it should be decided by the other Powers what proportion might be due to Russia; and if the House assented to the Resolutions he was now proposing, he should be ready to move another, which he had already proposed, to that effect. It should be remembered, however, that Russia, having received more than half of the whole, could hardly be entitled to much of the residue. However, he did not bring this subject forward from motives of economy alone; he did not say that the adoption of his Motion would produce a great saving of money, but at least it would relieve the country from the absurdity of supplying the enemy with means to enable him to carry on the war, while it would also relieve her from the degrading position which she had now so many years occupied, of having to pay tribute to Russia. The noble Lord concluded by moving his Resolutions.

MR. DIGBY SEYMOUR seconded the Motion.

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH: The noble Lord the Member for Marylebone (Lord D. Stuart) commenced his speech by saying that the question raised by his Motion is one which affects the character of this House. I agree with him. I think the question raised by his Motion will very injuriously affect the character of this House, if it should be carried. For what is the object of the Motion? It is expressed in the last words of the noble Lord's Resolutions, that the payments from this country to Russia on account of the Russian-Dutch debt should be henceforth suspended. Now, to suspend the payment of a debt is the usual and polite phrase which debtors adopt when they make the disagreeable fact known to their creditors that they are not going to pay their debts. Those who do not pay their debts are of two classes. The first are those who cannot pay, and they are called bankrupts; the second are those who will not pay, and they are called repudiators. The noble Lord proposes that we should join the class of repudiators.

The Motion of the noble Lord is nearly the same as one which was made in 1847. In that year it was proposed that we should repudiate our Russian-Dutch debt, because Russia had violated the rules of international law by breaking the stipulations of the treaty of Vienna of the 9th of June, 1815, with regard to the Republic of Cracow. Now, it is proposed to repudiate that debt because Russia has violated the rules of international law by breaking the stipulations of the treaty of Vienna with regard to the navigation of rivers. I resisted the Motion of 1847 for the same reasons that I resist the present Motion. The House rejected the Motion of 1847; it ought, without hesitation, to reject this Motion, for I think that this Motion is more objectionable than that of 1847, because in 1847 we were at peace, and now we are at war with Russia; and, in consequence of our being at war with Russia, I hold that we are more bound in honour to pay this debt than if we were at peace.

Sir, it is the modern rule of civilised war that a belligerent State should pay to an enemy debts contracted during peace. In former times this rule did not exist. Eminent publicists held that a belligerent State was entitled to make reprisals upon every kind of property belonging to an enemy, and to confiscate debts due to an enemy on the breaking out of a war. But for the last two centuries it has been the established rule of civilised nations that public debts should be paid to an enemy during war. During the whole of that period the only attempt to break that rule was in the famous case of the Silesian loan. I must call the attention of the House for one minute to that case, because it bears some analogy to that of the Russian-Dutch loan; and because, in the case of the Silesian loan, eminent law officers of the British Crown distinctly laid down the rule that public debts ought to be paid during war. When they laid down that rule its observance was for our pecuniary advantage, now its observance would be for our pecuniary disadvantage; therefore we are now specially bound to adhere to a rule which we originally upheld for our own benefit. I will state the case of the Silesian loan in a very few words. It was made in the year 1735, by English merchants, to the Emperor of Germany, on the security of the revenues of the Duchy of Silesia. In 1742 Silesia was ceded to Prussia by the treaty of Breslau. One of the conditions of that cession was, that the King of Prussia should become responsible for the Silesian debt, and should undertake the payment of it. In 1752, in consequence of the capture of Prussian vessels by British cruisers—a capture which a Commission of Prussian officers asserted to be in violation of the law of nations—the King of Prussia made reprisals on the Silesian debt, and suspended the payment of it; at the same time, he sent to the British Government the Report of the Prussian Commission as a justification of his conduct, based upon the law of nations. That Report was referred to a Commission of eminent English lawyers, of whom the Attorney General (Ryder) was one, and the Solicitor General (Murray), afterwards Lord Mansfield, was another. Their reply to the Prussian Report is celebrated, and was much praised both by Vattel and Montesquieu. In the opinion of Chancellor Kent, it “showed unanswerably that the King of Prussia could not lawfully seize the mortgaged revenues or debt by " way of reprisal, and that he was bound " by the law of nations, and every principle of justice, to pay the British creditors." In that reply, the law officers of the British Crown stated, " So scrupulously did England and France adhere " to public faith, that even during the " war"—the war which was terminated by the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle—" they suffered no inquiry to be made whether any " part of the public debt was due to the " subjects of the enemy, though it is certain many English had money in the " French funds, and many French had " money in ours." In all subsequent wars we adhered to this rule, and paid our public debts, without inquiry, alike to friends and foes. In the last European war it is said that the Emperor Napoleon I. had large sums of money in our funds, and regularly received his dividends. If the present Emperor of Russia holds any stock, he would also regularly receive his dividends, and would only be mulcted in the additional income tax as long as he is at war with us. I cannot discover any difference in principle between paying the Emperor of Russia, or his subjects, dividends on our consolidated debt, and paying to the Czar the interest of our Russian-Dutch debt.

Sir, the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone proposes to depart from our established usage with regard to the payment of our public debts—to depart from the modern rule of civilisation, and to resort to the ancient practice of barbarism. To justify such backsliding, so contrary to the spirit of the age, to that spirit of progress of which the noble Lord is supposed to be an advocate, the noble Lord ought to be able to assign some very special and valid reason. What reason has the noble Lord assigned? A considerable portion of his speech consisted of condemnation of the conduct of Russia. I agree with the noble Lord in condemning the conduct of Russia. I assent to the first three of the noble Lord's Resolutions. I admit that Russia was bound by the 118th article and the 16th annex of the Treaty of Vienna to be at the expense of maintaining the necessary works, through the extent of her territory, in the bed of the river Danube, in order that no obstacle may be experienced in the navigation. I acknowledge that Russia has broken this engagement, and I will assume that the conduct of Russia with regard to the bed of the Danube has been such as to constitute a casus belli. But I deny that a casus belli or war itself would entitle us to depart from the established usage of civilised nations by making reprisals on our Russian Dutch debt. The noble Lord, however, affirms that Russia has broken the specific engagement, in consideration of which we agreed to pay the Russian-Dutch debt. On this position I join issue with the noble Lord. I deny that Russia has broken the specific engagement, in consideration of which we became responsible for the payment of the Russian-Dutch debt. I assert that we are bound by treaties and Acts of Parliament, by the rules of international law and by honour, to continue to pay that debt.

In order to prove this position, I must ask permission to state, as briefly as I can, the origin and history of our engagements with regard to the Russian-Dutch loan, and in so doing I undertake to show—1. That we purchased from the Netherlands the four colonies of the Cape of Good Hope, Demerara, Essequibo, and Berbice, on condition that we should make certain payments on account of the Netherlands. 2. That one of the payments which we agreed to make for the Netherlands was for the purpose of discharging certain pecuniary obligations of the Netherlands to Russia; and the mode in which we engaged to make that payment was, by undertaking to pay off, by annual instalments, through the agency of Russia, a portion of the debt due by Russia on account of the Russian-Dutch loan. 3. That we engaged to continue those payments in every contingency, except that of Russia ceasing to identify her policy with that of Great Britain on all questions concerning Belgium. 4. That this contingency has not occurred; therefore we are bound by international law to continue those payments, because we have engaged to continue them in every other contingency, even in that of war, Russia being actually bound to her creditors by a similar agreement to continue her payments during war.

First, I have to show that we purchased from the Netherlands the four colonies of the Cape of Good Hope, Demerara, Essequibo, and Berbice, by agreeing to make certain payments on account of the Netherlands. To do so, I must observe that in the wars of the French Revolution we took possession of the colonies belonging to the Dutch, not because we were at war with Holland, but to preserve them from France when France took possession of Holland. Consequently, when in 1814 Holland was liberated from the dominion of France, we were bound in honour to restore to Holland her colonies of which we had taken possession. Therefore, on the 13th of August, 1814, we concluded a convention with the Netherlands, in the first article of which we engaged to restore to the Netherlands all the colonies which were possessed by Holland on the 1st of January, 1803, with the exception of the Cape of Good Hope, Demerara, Essequibo, and Berbice, which possessions were to be disposed of by a supplementary convention. That supplementary convention was contained in the first additional article to the convention to which I have just referred—namely, of the 13th of August, 1814. By that additional article we engaged, first, to pay 1,000,000*l.* to Sweden; secondly, to advance 2,000,000*l.* to be applied towards augmenting and improving the defences of the Low Countries; thirdly—and to this engagement I beg especial attention—to bear equally with Holland such further charges as might be agreed upon towards the final and satisfactory settlement of the Low Countries, in union with Holland, &c., not exceeding in the whole the sum of 3,000,000*l.*, to be defrayed by Great Britain. In consideration of these engagements, the Netherlands agreed to cede in full sovereignty to His Britannic Majesty the colonies of the Cape of Good Hope, Demerara, Essequibo, and Berbice.

I have shown that we bought from the Netherlands four colonies for a sum not exceeding 6,000,000*l.*, of which a sum not exceeding 3,000,000*l.* was to be expended in promoting the final and satisfactory settlement of the affairs of Holland and Belgium. The manner in which that sum was to be expended for the purpose in question was determined by a convention signed at London on the 19th of May, 1815, between Great Britain and the Netherlands and Russia. The noble Lord asserts in his fourth Resolution that the convention of the 19th of May, 1815, was included in the Treaty of Vienna of the 9th of June, 1815. I think the noble Lord is mistaken. I cannot find any article which makes the convention of the 19th of May, 1815, a part of the Treaty of Vienna. In the preamble to that convention it was stated that His Majesty the King of the Netherlands was desirous to render to the Allied Powers, who were parties to the treaty concluded at Chaumont on the 1st of March, 1814, a suitable return for the heavy expense incurred by them in delivering his territories from the power of the enemy; and that the said Powers had, in consideration of arrangements made with each other, mutually agreed to waive their several pretensions under this head in favour of His Majesty the Emperor of All the Russias. Now, what were the arrangements between the Powers who were parties to the Treaty of Chaumont at the period at which the convention of the 19th of May, 1815, was concluded at London? They were not the stipulations of the Treaty of Vienna of the 9th of June, 1815, for that treaty had not then been signed; but they were general territorial arrangements of the Congress of Vienna. One of those territorial arrangements was the union of Holland and Belgium. It is evident from Lord Castlereagh's despatch of the 13th of February, 1815, that he was anxious to obtain the approval by Russia of that territorial arrangement. With that object in view, Lord Castlereagh expressed to Lord Liverpool his persuasion of the policy and necessity of such a measure as that of the convention of the 19th of May, 1815. He declared that it was impossible, after the principles laid down in our convention with the Netherlands of August 13, 1814, that we could retain the Cape of Good Hope, Demerara, Essequibo, and Berbice, without incurring some charge for them; and his despatch shows that he thought that the charge had best be incurred for the objects of the convention of May 19, 1815. What were those objects? According to the preamble of the convention of 1815, it was executed by Great Britain in pursuance of engagements taken by His Britannic Majesty with the King of the Netherlands, in a convention signed at London on the 13th of August, 1814—those engagements being (as I have already said), to pay a sum not exceeding 6,000,000*l.* for retaining the colonies of the Cape of Good Hope, Demerara, Essequibo, and Berbice, of which a sum not exceeding 3,000,000*l.* was to be applied to bring about the final and satisfactory settlement of the affairs of the Netherlands. To accomplish these objects, and to make a suitable return to Russia for the heavy expense incurred by her in delivering the Netherlands from the power of the enemy—in the first article the King of the Netherlands engaged to take upon himself a part of the capital, &c., of the Russian loan made in Holland through the intervention of the house of Hope and Co. in Amsterdam; and the King of Great Britain engaged on his part to recommend to his Parliament to enable him to take upon himself an equal capital of the Russian loan—namely 25,000,000 florins, equal to about 2,080,000*l*. In the second article their Belgic and Britannic Majesties engaged to pay an annual interest of 5 per cent on the said capitals, together with a sinking fund of 1 per cent. In the third and fourth articles it was agreed that these payments should be made through the agency of Russia, and that Russia should “continue as heretofore to be security to the creditors for the whole of the said loan, and shall be charged with the administration of the same, their Belgic and Britannic Majesties remaining liable to His Imperial Majesty, each for the punctual discharge of the respective portions of the said charge.” In the fifth article it was agreed—evidently with the view of bringing about the final and satisfactory settlement of the Low Countries in union with Holland, and of giving to Russia a strong pecuniary motive to identify her policy with ours respecting Belgium—that the payments in question should cease and determine, should the sovereignty of the Belgic provinces be severed from the dominions of the King of the Netherlands previously to the liquidation of the debt in question. And it was also agreed in the fifth article that the payments in question should not be interrupted in the event of a war breaking out between any of the three contracting parties; the Government of Russia being (to use the words of the fifth article) actually bound to its creditors by a similar agreement. This article, therefore, assigns as a reason why we should continue our payments during war, that Russia is bound to continue her payments during war. And, consequently, if we were to interrupt our payments during war, Russia might consider herself entitled to imitate our example; for, by the terms of the convention of 1815, Russia merely became our agent for the payment of a debt which we had taken upon ourselves for the valuable consideration of four colonies. Therefore, if we were to cease to supply Russia with the funds for making the payments in question, Russia might plead that she was simply our agent, and interrupt her payments to her creditors on account of the Russian-Dutch loan.

Sir, effect was given to the convention of the 19th of May, 1815, by the Act 55 Geo. III. chap. 115. By that Act we bound ourselves, for whatever cause we might go to war with Russia, whether for the violation by Russia of any or of every one of the stipulations of the Treaty of Vienna, to continue during war to pay, through the agency of Russia, the interest, &c., of our portion of the Russian-Dutch debt as long as Holland and Belgium were united. As we were not entitled to discontinue those payments on account of any act of Russia which would have caused us to engage in a war with Russia, à fortiori we were not entitled to discontinue those payments on account of any act of Russia which would not have caused us to engage in war with Russia. Consequently, under the Convention and Act of 1815, we were bound to continue to pay, through the agency of Russia, the interest, &c., of our portion of the Russian-Dutch debt till that portion was liquidated, in every conceivable contingency, except that of the separation of Holland and Belgium. But that contingency did occur in the year 1830.

Sir, in the year 1830, Holland was separated from Belgium; therefore, by the convention of the 19th of May, 1815, we were then released from the obligation of making any further payments on account of the Russian-Dutch debt. But we were not so released by the spirit of the convention of 1815; for I have shown that one of the objects of that convention was to make the policy of Russia the same as that of England with regard to Holland and Belgium. We thought, in 1815, that this object would be best attained by binding Russia under pecuniary penalties to uphold and maintain the union of Holland and Belgium. In 1831, we changed our mind upon this subject, and thought that Holland and Belgium should be permanently separated. That separation took place in 1830, not from any fault of Russia; but in spite of the wishes of Russia; for Russia had offered to send an army of 60,000 men to prevent that separation, and had only desisted from so doing in consequence of the representations of her allies, and especially of Great Britain. Therefore, Russia, by not sending an army to prevent the separation of Holland and Belgium, acted in accordance with the spirit, though not with the letter, of the convention of 1815. For, as I have already said, one of the objects of that convention was to induce Russia to adopt our policy with regard to Holland and Belgium. Consequently, we could not accuse Russia of having in any way acted contrary to the spirit of the convention of 1815; and, therefore, we could not with honour have refused to continue the payments on account of the Russian-Dutch loan, in consequence of the occurrence of an event which Russia was willing to prevent, but which we approved, and which we desired Russia not to attempt to prevent, but, on the contrary, to assent to. For these objects and reasons we concluded with Russia two engagements in 1831—first, on the 15th of November, 1831, a treaty with Russia and other Powers relative to the separation of Belgium from Holland; and, on the following day, a convention with Russia alone relative to the Russian-Dutch debt. There can be no doubt that one of the considerations which induced us to agree to the convention of the 16th of November, 1831, was that Russia had agreed to the treaty of the 15th of November, 1831.

Sir, in the preamble of the convention of November 16, 1831, it is stated that "complete agreement did not exist between the letter and the spirit of the convention of May 19, 1815;" that, "on referring to the object of the above-mentioned convention, it appeared that that object was to afford to Great Britain a guarantee that Russia would, on all questions concerning Belgium, identify her policy with that which the Court of London had deemed the best adapted for the maintenance of a just balance of power in Europe." I have shown that one of the chief objects of the convention of 1815 was to give effect to the stipulations of the convention of the 13th of August, 1814, that England should apply a portion of the purchase-money of the Dutch colonies of the Cape of Good Hope, Demerara, Essequibo, and Berbice, towards the final and satisfactory settlement of the affairs of the Netherlands; and I have also shown that we endeavoured to attain this object by stipulating that our payments on account of the Russian-Dutch loan should cease in the event of the separation of Holland and Belgium, and that thus we held out a strong inducement to Russia to maintain that union.

The other chief object of the convention of 1815, according to the preamble of the convention of 1831, was "to secure to Russia the payment of a portion of her old Dutch debt in consideration of the general arrangements of the Congress

"of Vienna to which she had given her adhesion—arrangements which remain in full force." The precise meaning of these words has been misunderstood. The arrangements here mentioned are the same as those referred to in the convention of the 19th of May, 1815, and not the stipulations of the Treaty of Vienna as to the navigation of rivers, which treaty was not signed till the 9th of June, 1815. They were the arrangements between the Allied Powers who concluded the treaty of Chaumont, in consideration of which arrangements the Allied Powers waived in favour of Russia their pecuniary claims on the Netherlands for the expense incurred by them in delivering the Netherlands from the enemy. In order to satisfy a portion of these claims, the Netherlands transferred to Russia a portion of the claims of the Netherlands on Great Britain, on account of the sale to Great Britain of the colonies of the Cape of Good Hope, Demerara, Essequibo, and Berbice. In consequence of this transfer we became indebted to Russia, and to liquidate our debt to Russia we agreed by the convention of 1815 to pay, through the agency of Russia, the interest, &c., of a portion of the Russian-Dutch debt. When that convention became null in 1830, we then contracted with Russia a new engagement for a new consideration.

Sir, in the first article of the convention of the 16th of November, 1831, His Britannic Majesty engaged to recommend to his Parliament to enable him to undertake to continue, on his part, the payments stipulated in the convention of the 19th of May, 1815, according to the mode, and until the completion of the sum fixed for Great Britain in the said convention. And, on the other hand, in the second article the Emperor of Russia engaged that, "if the arrangements agreed upon for the independence and neutrality of Belgium should be endangered by the course of events, and to the maintenance of which the two high Powers are equally bound," by the treaty of the previous day, "he will not contract any other engagement without a previous agreement with His Britannic Majesty and his formal assent." Thus in 1831 we contracted a new engagement with Russia for a new consideration. Parliament confirmed that contract in 1832 by the Act 2 & 3 Will. IV. chap. 81, in which we recited at length—first, the convention of the 16th of November, 1831; next, the stipulations of the convention of the 19th of May, 1815, and among them we recited the engagement that our payments on account of the Russian-Dutch debt should not be interrupted in the event of a war breaking out between us and Russia, the Emperor of All the Russias being, as we asserted, actually bound to his creditors by a similar agreement; and we enacted "to continue the payments" stipulated in the convention of the 19th of May, 1815, according to the mode, "and until the completion of the sum fixed for Great Britain in the said last-mentioned convention, and to complete and carry into effect in all other respects the stipulations of the said last-mentioned convention, and of the said convention of the 16th of November, 1831." Therefore, by this Act of Parliament, we are bound to carry into effect every stipulation of the convention of 1815, except that which has reference to the separation of Holland and Belgium, and consequently we are bound to carry into effect the stipulation of the fifth article, that we should continue our payments, through the agency of Russia, in the event of a war breaking out with Russia. Now, I must observe that in the convention of the 16th of November, 1831, no event is specified in which our payments on account of the Russian-Dutch loan shall cease and determine before the completion of the sum fixed for Great Britain. In that convention we merely engaged to continue our payments on account of the Russian-Dutch debt, Russia, on the other hand, engaging not to contract any new engagement respecting Belgium without a previous agreement with His Britannic Majesty and his formal consent. Therefore, as long as Russia fulfils this specific engagement, we are bound to fulfil our engagement to make the payments in question, even during war. We are bound by conventions and an Act of Parliament to continue those payments during war, irrespectively of the cause of war. Therefore we should have been bound to continue those payments, if we had gone to war with Russia on account of the violation by Russia of all or any of the stipulations of the Treaty of Vienna. Therefore, assuming, for the sake of argument with the noble Lord, that the conduct of Russia with regard to the bed of the Danube was such a flagrant violation of the Treaty of Vienna that we ought to have made it a casus belli, still I have shown that, in the event of such a war, or of any war, we should have been bound to continue our payments through the agency of Russia as long as Russia did not violate the engagement contained in the second article of the convention of 1831. Now, Russia has not violated that engagement, for the arrangements agreed upon in 1831 for the independence and neutrality of Belgium, and to the maintenance of which Great Britain and Russia are equally bound by the treaty of the 15th of November, 1831, have not been endangered by the course of events, and Russia has not contracted any other engagement respecting Belgium without a previous agreement with His Britannic Majesty and his formal consent.

Sir, I have proved that by the conventions of 1814, 1815, and 1831, we first agreed to purchase from the Netherlands the four colonies of the Cape of Good Hope, Demerara, Essequibo, and Berbice; secondly, we agreed to apply a portion of the purchase-money towards the final and satisfactory settlement of the affairs of the Netherlands, and towards discharging a portion of the pecuniary obligations of the Netherlands to Russia on account of the expense incurred by Russia and her allies in delivering the Netherlands from the dominion of France; thirdly, with these objects in view, we agreed to pay off, by annual instalments, through the agency of Russia, the capital and interest of a portion of a debt due by Russia on account of a loan raised in Holland; fourthly, that we engaged to continue those payments during war (Russia being actually bound to her creditors by a similar engagement), and in every other contingency, except that of Russia ceasing to identify her policy with that of Great Britain respecting Belgium. I have therefore shown that, by agreeing to make and continue the payments in question, we not only partly purchased four colonies, but that we also purchased, in the first instance, in 1815, the assent of Russia to the union of Belgium and Holland, and bound Russia to uphold that union; and, in the second instance, in 1831, we purchased the assent of Russia to the separation of Belgium and Holland, and bound Russia not to contract any new engagement with respect to Belgium without our previous agreement and formal consent. Therefore I contend that we are now bound by treaties and Acts of Parliament, by the rules of international law and by honour, to continue the payments in question, though we are at war with Russia; Russia being actually bound to her creditors, by a similar engagement, to continue her payments during war. Therefore, if we were to cease to pay Russia, Russia might plead our repudiation of our debt as an excuse for her repudiation of her debt; and if she were not to do so, but were to continue her payments in spite of our repudiation, what a sorry figure we should cut among the nations of the earth!

Sir, we have engaged in this war, not for any petty personal motive, nor for any miserable pecuniary interest, but for high and noble objects—to protect the weak, to humble the pride of the strong—for the lasting benefit of Europe, to prevent the dangerous aggrandisement of Russia at the expense of the Ottoman empire. We are determined to prosecute this war vigorously and fearlessly till we have accomplished our great and noble ends. Let us not, by agreeing to this Motion, expose ourselves to the suspicion that we wish to make a pretext of this war to escape from the payment of a just debt due on account of the purchase of four great colonies, of which we retain undisputed possession. Be assured that the pecuniary benefit to be gained by the repudiation of this debt would be dearly purchased by the loss of the reputation which we should acquire by a scrupulous and punctilious fulfilment of engagements, and by the example of good faith which we should set to the nations of the world. The argument of the noble Lord is, Russia has broken treaties; therefore we ought to break treaties; Russia has been faithless, therefore we ought to be faithless; Russia has done wrong, therefore we ought to do wrong. Now, from the same premises, I arrive at conclusions diametrically opposed to those of the noble Lord. I say, because Russia has disregarded the stipulations of treaties, we ought even to be punctilious in fulfilling our engagements; because Russia has set an example of bad faith to Europe, we ought to set an example of good faith to the world; because Russia has been a wrongdoer, we ought to be most careful to do right, so that we may have reason and justice completely on our side. I therefore ask the House to reject the Motion of the noble Lord, a Motion which would better become the delegate of some obscure and bankrupt Transatlantic constituency than the representative of the wealth—the noble representative of the intelligence—of a portion of the great metropolis of this vast commercial empire. I offer my hearty opposition to the Motion, not merely as a Minister of the Crown, but also as one of the representatives of this metropolis, which the noble Lord misrepresents when he proposes to repudiate a debt which we are bound in honour and by treaty to pay.

Mr. DIGBY SEYMOUR said, the right hon. Baronet had done justice neither to the arguments nor to the motives of his noble Friend (Lord Dudley Stuart) in bringing this subject before the House. Every argument of the speech of the right hon. Baronet was distinctly contrary to the views of the question taken by the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, who took for one of the grounds of the present war with Russia the conditions made for the preservation of the navigation of the rivers by the Treaty of Vienna, and considered the condition to which Russia had reduced the navigation of the Danube as a direct violation of that treaty. And again, in 1846, Her Majesty, in the Speech from the Throne, distinctly stated that the annexation of the State of Cracow was a violation of the stipulations of the Treaty of Vienna. The right hon. Baronet had therefore proved too much, because he had admitted that there had been distinct violations of the Treaty of Vienna on more than one occasion. Neither could the noble Lord be justly accused of advising the country to a system of repudiation. His noble Friend did not ask the House to repudiate anything, but he asked them not to continue paying out of the public purse, of which they were the conservators, a sum of money to Russia, when the conditions upon which the obligation to make such payment had originally attached had been broken by the wilful misconduct of Russia. The argument of the right hon. Baronet in reference to Sillesia were inapplicable to the question now before the House, for his noble Friend did not put it as a question of reprisals, but as one of the violation of a solemn covenant and the forfeiture of its conditions. He denied that there was any analogy between this case and that of the fundholder, and the right hon. Baronet, without having grappled with the real question before them, had given an opinion directly opposed to that delivered by the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston) in his despatches to foreign Ministers with regard to the construction of the Treaty of Vienna. After the separation between Holland and Belgium it was admitted that, under the strict letter of the convention of 1815, the obligation of England to pay her quota was dissolved; but Lord Althorp and other eminent statesmen held that the spirit of the convention had not been violated by Russia, she not having been a party to promoting the separation between the two countries, and therefore that it would not be becoming in this country to take advantage of it. He quite concurred in that view; but a special Act had to be obtained to sanction a new convention, based upon the alterations which then took place in the relations between the two countries. He then came to the important debate of 1847, in which the most competent legal authorities and the most eminent statesmen took the view which his noble Friend had taken to-night with regard to the general arrangements of the Treaty of Vienna being identical with the question of the annexation of the free State of Cracow. The noble Lord the Leader of the House then said, it was true that the annexation of Cracow was a violation of the convention of 1831, but they would do well to satisfy themselves with a protest instead of taking advantage of that breach; for by so doing they would probably prevent a similar occurrence at a future time. Russia had again taken a similar course, so that the argument of the noble Lord the Leader of the House would not now be applicable. The opinion of the noble Lord and that of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton, as expressed in his despatches, together with the statement contained in the Queen's Speech in 1846, that the annexation of Cracow was in direct violation of the general arrangements of the Treaty of Vienna, were strong arguments in favour of his noble Friend's proposition. Another argument was the tacit admission of Russia herself; for if it were true that the keeping clear of the Sulina mouths of the Danube was not one of the stipulations of the Treaty of Vienna, how was it that Count Nesselrode had not attempted to dispute the liability of Russia to keep them clear? With regard to the question of a breach of faith with the public creditor, he would quote a passage from the speech of the Recorder of London, in the debate of 1847. The right hon. Gentleman said:—

“ England was not security for Holland, nor Holland for England. The debt was due to subjects of the King of the Netherlands by the Crown of Russia; the amount was 25,000,000 florins, and, in consideration of the kingdom of Holland being fortified, England entered into a distinct understanding to make a separate payment to the Dutch creditors of Russia; but neither England nor Holland was security for the other. Russia, however, might be said to be security for both; because, without the grossest breach of faith which any nation could commit, she could not evade the payment of that debt which she had contracted to certain subjects of the Crown of Holland. England might fail to make good her part of the contract; the King of the Netherlands might not succeed in performing all that he had undertaken; but such failures on the part of others would never excuse Russia from the discharge of all the obligations which she had contracted. Russia could not for a moment refuse to comply with the terms to which she had bound herself, without at once giving ground for a casus belli.”

It was agreed on all hands that by the Treaty of Vienna the mouths of the Danube were not to be closed; it was also admitted that those mouths were now choked up by the wilful negligence of Russia; and there could be no question, therefore, that the Treaty of Vienna had been violated. Another violation of the treaty consisted in the seizure of the free town of Cracow; so that all these cases would now justify England in standing upon her strict rights, quite irrespective of the question of war or peace, and refusing to pay the forthcoming instalment to Russia.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had wholly misconceived the argument of his right hon. Friend (Sir W. Molesworth) in supposing that he had attempted to maintain that the closure by Russia of the mouths of the Danube was not a violation of the Treaty of Vienna. His right hon. Friend had throughout his speech admitted that the treaty had been violated, and therefore all the energy and all the vehemence which the hon. Gentleman had expended on the point was altogether thrown away. No doubt Russia was bound to keep the mouths of the Danube open—no doubt her closing of them was a violation of the Treaty of Vienna. The difficulty was to prove that this violation of the Treaty of Vienna would justify England in withholding the payment of the loan. To make out this they must first of all show that the engagement to pay the loan was based upon the Treaty of Vienna. His right hon. Friend the Member for Southwark had clearly shown that that was not the case, and nothing could be plainer than the statement which he made. England stood indebted to Holland in the sum of 3,000,000*l.* sterling as the price of four colonies. It was now said that these colonies were worthless. Well, such was the revulsion of feeling upon colonial subjects, that he would not now undertake to say whether the people of England now considered the Cape Colony worthless or not. But, at any rate, if that was a bargain, it did not lie in their mouths to say that the Colony was not worth the price, and that, therefore, they would repudiate the debt. Whatever they might think of the Cape Colony now, at the time the engagement was entered into it was considered to be a very valuable acquisition, and they must be bound by the bargain. Well, to return to the statement—this country agreed to pay Holland 3,000,000*l.* sterling as the price of these four colonies, to be applied as Holland might prescribe. It happened that at the close of the war the Allied Powers claimed from Holland some compensation for the expenses of the war, and at the same time they agreed to transfer their claims to Russia. After some negotiation Holland consented that we should pay the 3,000,000*l.* which we owed to her to Russia in lieu of her contribution towards the expenses of the war; and all these negotiations, be it understood, were anterior to, and independent of the Treaty of Vienna. But if the arrangement had been originally based upon that treaty, still his right hon. Friend had clearly shown that in 1831 a new arrangement was entered into, by which, on condition that Russia would unite her policy to England on the subject of the separation between Holland and Belgium, England would still continue to pay the money. Even if the question had, therefore, originally rested upon the Treaty of Vienna, it had been removed from that basis by the treaty of 1831. And if it were not so, still it would ill become this country at the present conjuncture to repudiate her engagements. Did they suppose that we should be able to persuade the other countries of Europe that if peace had been maintained we should have set up the closing of the Sulina mouth of the Danube as a reason for not continuing to pay this loan? The pretext was so hollow that all the world would see through it. Even with the clearest and strongest grounds for refusing payment, England ought to be most chary, scrupulous, and punctilious in refusing payment of her engagements in the time of war. And why? Because in war no opportunity was afforded for those communications and explanations which in a time of peace would be sure to precede such a rupture as this. If a difference of opinion on such a subject took place between two Powers in a time of peace, there could be no doubt that they would make every exertion and use every argument to make the other Power see the impropriety of their conduct before coming to an open rupture. But all opportunity for such explanations was now closed, and England would stand before Europe in the position of a country which took advantage of war to violate engagements to which they were bound by the most solemn consideration of honour and good faith to adhere.

LORD DUDLEY STUART, in reply, said, if it had been shown that they were bound in honour to fulfil this engagement, he should abandon his Motion, as he desired nothing but what was just and equitable, and would do nothing which could fairly subject his fellow-countrymen to the odious appellation which the right hon. Baronet had applied to himself of a repudiator. He must distinctly assert that there was no repudiation whatever in his proposal. The right hon. Gentleman had referred with an air of triumph to the case of the Silesian loan: but there was no affinity whatever between that case and the present. In that case the question was between a State and individuals; in this case the question was between one State and another, and, as he had before observed, what they had to consider was whether the conditions on which the money was payable had been fulfilled or been violated. It appeared as though there were always to be reasons why it was necessary to continue paying this money. Some years ago it was urged that they must pay, because they were at peace; the reason now assigned was that they were at war. It would be better if there were no conditions at all attached to the payment. Let them say at once, "No matter what happens, the payments shall continue to be made—the treaties are so much waste paper." As to the value of the colonies obtained from Holland, the late Earl Grey and the entire Opposition of the day, said the arrangement was a most improvident one. The right hon. Baronet and the hon. and learned Attorney General had carefully avoided saying one word respecting the document on which he (Lord Dudley Stuart) had almost entirely rested his case, namely, the statement respecting the nature of the Convention made by the Russian Plenipotentiary himself. It was tolerably clear, therefore, that his opponents found themselves entirely unable to answer the argument which he had founded upon that document. He was glad that by introducing the subject he had elicited the opinion of a Cabinet Minister, but he had heard nothing which had altered his opinion on the subject, and he must therefore divide the House.

MR. CAYLEY said, he hoped that the noble Lord would not carry his intention of dividing into effect. England was not more distinguished for her good faith than for her arts, arms, or sciences, and the noble Lord's Motion went directly to impugn that good faith. The Emperor of Russia would accept such a Motion, if carried, as a compensation for all his losses in the war. It would ill become us to repudiate a payment because we happened to be at war with our creditor. If the noble Lord did divide, he hoped there would be nobody on his side but the mover and seconder.

SIR DENHAM NORREYS also urged the noble Lord not to divide.

OUR CAVALRY IN THE EAST.

MR. W. WILLIAMS, in moving for the return of which he had given notice, said, that there was at this moment a great deal of agitation in the public mind with regard to the disproportionate number of officers in our cavalry force in the East as compared with the number of men. There was one officer in the cavalry regiments for every ten men; and somewhat more than one officer and one non-commissioned officer for every five men. This was considerably more than twice the number of officers attached to the cavalry regiments serving under the Duke of Wellington in the Peninsular war. With regard to our infantry, the number of officers there was one officer to every twenty-five men, according to the Army Estimates of the present Session. Common sense would point out to any one that so large a proportion of officers in the cavalry could not be required.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That there be laid before this House, a Return of the effective force of Cavalry employed or now under orders for the East; stating the number of Regiments; of Officers, specifying their respective ranks, in each Regiment; the number of effective Men and Horses actually embarked; and of the General and Staff Officers attached to the Cavalry Service; specifying the Rank and Names of the General Officers, and of their Staff.”

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that the return for which the hon. Gentleman had moved was one which he thought the Government could not grant without departing from its duty. With respect generally to returns moved for relating to the Army, there was no force, he supposed, in Europe which was conducted upon principles so patent to the world as the British Army, and since he had had anything to do with the administration of the Army, he had certainly not erred upon the side of refusing information when wanted. The hon. Gentleman, who took great interest in these things, and was very reasonable in his mode of dealing with them, would, he thought, see that his object could be attained without asking for returns which would, if granted, be prejudicial to the public service. He admitted the greater part of the hon. Gentleman's case. The hon. Gentleman said there was a great disproportion of officers to men in the cavalry regiments, and that there were many more of the former than were requisite to the number of men in those regiments. That was perfectly true, but the converse of it was also true,—that there was not a sufficient number of men to the number of officers. Our cavalry force had been maintained during peace as a skeleton force, and this in itself afforded a very weak framework. The regiments in this country during peace were composed only of six troops; in India they were raised to ten troops; but here they were maintained at six with a very small number of men in each troop, in order that that force might be maintained as economically as possible, and in order that it might be capable of expansion when the necessity arose. This expansion, however, was not a thing which could be attained in a day; and, looking at the hon. Gentleman's Motion, the feeling it inspired him with was rather remorse that they had not kept up the cavalry regiments in a more efficient state. Now, however, they were augmenting the cavalry regiments, and raising additional men for them, and he trusted that the disproportion of officers to men, of which the hon. Gentleman complained, would before long be to a considerable degree remedied. With regard to the return moved for, he thought by granting it the House would in this particular case create a precedent which, under present circumstances would be a very dangerous one. He feared they would not be able to induce the War Office at St. Petersburg to exchange returns on this subject, and therefore to grant a return of this kind would be to introduce a precedent which might be very inconvenient. At the same time he did not deny the facts of the case as stated by the hon. Gentleman, who, in his vigilance with regard to economy, had very properly looked into this matter.

LORD SEYMOUR said, he hoped the hon. Member for Lambeth would not press the Motion after the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary at War. At the same time he must call to the recollection of his right hon. Friend what had passed before the Committee on the Army Estimates on this very subject. This question was brought under the consideration of the Committee, and the statement made to the Committee by the army authorities was, "Undoubtedly there are too many officers in the cavalry regiments now, but whenever war breaks out we shall fill up the number of men, and then there will not be too many officers." When, however, we came, as now, to a time of war, we found the cavalry regiments sent abroad without the additional number of men, and then his right hon. Friend said, "Yes, it is quite true there are too many officers, but there are also too few men." So the House was met in either case. The Committee to which he alluded were certainly led to believe that, in case of war, men would have been contributed from the regiments at home so as to fill up and complete the regiments going abroad, instead of sending them out in these insufficient numbers. The Committee had been given to understand that this could be easily done upon an emergency, and he should like to be informed now what was the obstacle which had apparently rendered this course impracticable.

Mr. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that the course which the Government adopted had been the very one which the noble Lord himself suggested. The House must remember, however, that though you might take men from other regiments, leaving them in a low state, you could not altogether destroy those regiments. In the present instance the cavalry regiments which remained in this country had contributed men to those sent abroad, which had already been considerably strengthened in that way.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he considered that the return, if granted, would be a very mischievous one. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. Williams) had better move for a return of our whole force and send it to St. Petersburg. He thought the mere transfer of men to one cavalry regiment from the other would not meet what was wanted in the case. The fact was, that a false spirit of economy had prevailed with regard to our cavalry force.

Mr. W. WILLIAMS said, he would adopt the recommendation of the noble Lord (Lord Seymour) not to press this Motion, because the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary at War had admitted everything he had said. As to what had been said by the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Dunne), the fact was that the military authorities at St. Petersburg knew a great deal more about the state of our Army than the hon. and gallant Member probably did. There was, perhaps, not a secret worth knowing in the office of the Secretary at War but was known at St. Petersburg.

Motion put, and negatived.

PUBLIC HEALTH BILL.

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to make better provision for the administration of the laws relating to the public health, stated, that the Bill was framed in strict conformity with the opinions, views, and wishes expressed yesterday by the House. The desire of the Government was to act in conformity with those views and opinions, which he understood to be to this effect, that a department ought to be constituted which should have the administration of the Public Health Act, the Nuisances Removal Act, and any other measure affecting the public health of the country. He took it to be the opinion of the House, that the Board of Health, as at present constituted, consisting of four members, two of whom were paid and two unpaid, was not a good Board for the administration of the Public Health Act. The opinion expressed was, that there ought to be some person in that House who should be directly responsible to Parliament for the administration of the Public Health Act, who should be able in his place in that House to explain the reasons for any provisional order or Order in Council which might be issued, and likewise to explain all matters which might arise under the Nuisances Removal Act, as well as answer all questions respecting the general health of the country. He also understood that the opinion of the House was that the administration of the new departments should not become part and portion of the Home Office, though in many respects, undoubtedly, the administration of the health of the country was very nearly connected with the administration of the Home Office. The opinion of the House, however, was that there was not a closer analogy between the two departments than there was between the Poor Law Board and the Home Department, and that there should be a new department constituted in the same manner as the Poor Law Board was constituted. He had, therefore, prepared a Bill which gave to the new Board of Health precisely the same constitution as the Poor Law Board possessed. A President would be appointed who would have a seat in that House, and who would have a secretary and under secretary. The only other alteration proposed to be made with regard to the officers of the Board of Health was, that the superintending inspectors should be salaried officers of the Board, and should not be employed, as at present, upon jobs, or, in other words, that they should not be able to undertake work upon their own private account. It had been a matter of great complaint that the inspecting officers sent down by the Board of Health, not being salaried officers, could be employed upon other work in the district to which they were sent, and the Bill, therefore, proposed that the superintending inspectors should become salaried officers, so that there should be no danger of their getting up work for their own special advantage. These were the provisions of the Public Health Bill, which he now asked the leave of the House to introduce; but he might add, that it was proposed to insert a clause in the Bill to give compensation, not exceeding 1,000*l.* a year, to one of the present members of the Board of Health. It was thought that, though some obloquy might have been thrown upon Mr. Chadwick with regard to his services in connection with the Board, that gentleman had been for many years a very valuable public officer, and that, therefore, some compensation ought to be given to him.

SIR GEORGE PECHELL said, he begged to express his satisfaction at the heads of the Bill. It was his belief that if there was an inquiry into the Board of Health similar to that which had taken place into the Andover Union some years back, the necessity for the re-construction of the present Board would become manifest.

LORD SEYMOUR said, he felt gratified in being enabled to offer his thanks to the Government for introducing a Bill which he believed would give much satisfaction not only to that House, but also throughout the country. He thought the course taken by Government was, under the circumstances, a very judicious one, and, with respect to the proposal to compensate Mr. Chadwick, he could only say that he should be very sorry if anything which he had said in that House were to prevent that gentleman from receiving compensation for his services during the long time he had been a public servant. He had observed the conduct of Mr. Chadwick for one or two years in connection with the Board of Health, and having occasion to differ in opinion from Mr. Chadwick, he had fairly stated that difference. It would, however, be most unfair if he were to endeavour to make use of any difference of opinion so as to prevent a public officer from receiving compensation for his services. He conceived that the services of Mr. Chadwick, particularly with regard to the original inquiry which led to the formation of the Poor Law Board, had been very meritorious, and had been of great value to the country. He approved generally of the Bill proposed now to be introduced by his right hon. Friend, though, of course, he could not at present express any opinion upon its details. As, however, they were to have an inquiry next year, it might be as well only to take the Bill at present for one year, so that, when the subject came under consideration next Session, they might be enabled to form some judgment of the constitution of the new department, together with the salaries paid and other details. He most anxiously desired that any measures adopted might work well in promoting sanitary improvements throughout the country, and he hoped at the same time that the new department would be so constituted that it would interfere as little as possible with that local self-government which was absolutely necessary in order to give confidence in any measures introduced by the Government.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought the plan likely to be a good one, though it might require some modification. He entirely approved of the provision prohibiting officers of the Board from taking work upon their own account; but he did not attach so much importance as many hon. Members did to the President of the Board having a seat in that House. He approved of compensation being made to Mr. Chadwick, but whether the amount stated was the right sum or not he would not now undertake to say. At the same time, there was a general understanding in the House the other day, that the whole question in relation to the Board of Health and the existing law should be subject to inquiry. Such an inquiry was absolutely necessary; and as it should take place next Session, he hoped the present measure would only have a provisional character.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, there could be no objection to an inquiry next Session into the working of the whole of the Acts relating to the public health, and with relation to the powers intrusted to the Board in carrying them out. It could hardly be doubted that for the future the care of the health of the country was a duty sufficient to occupy the official persons who might have charge of the department. There appeared to have been some misapprehension of what his right hon. Friend (Sir W. Molesworth) had said with respect to the President of the Board. What his right hon. Friend said was, that there should be only one officer, the President, capable of holding a seat in that House. As to the duration of the Bill, one year would probably be too short, as there was to be an inquiry, which might turn out a lengthened one.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he hoped that, after the failure of the Board of Health, as constituted by Lord Morpeth's Act, with its arbitrary and centralising powers—a failure which, he might remark, had been predicted by the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley)—the Government would be fully impressed with the absolute impossibility of the success of any system which was not founded on the principle of local self-government. With regard to his own constituency, he believed he might say that no greater service had ever been rendered to the great town of Birmingham than the prevention of the introduction there of the powers of the Board of Health, and the establishment of a system in lieu of them which, founded on the principle of local self-government, would be, he believed, permanent and successful.

MR. DUNCAN said, he thought that, wherever it was absolutely necessary to interfere with local bodies, that interference should be as light as possible.

Leave given; Bill ordered to be brought in by Sir WILLIAM MOLESWORTH and Mr. FITZROY.

Bill read 1^o.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND) BILL.

House in Committee.

MR. BOWYER said, he could not allow the Bill to go on without protesting against its progress. The Bill was introduced at a time very different to the present, and a Bill on account of crime and outrage was no longer needed. He could say that crime and outrage had generally diminished in Ireland; and as far as the county of Louth was concerned, crime and outrage were extinct. The people of that portion of Ireland were orderly and loyal, and did not require such a Bill. He believed the Bill was not required now, and next year he believed there would be found even less necessity for it. If the Bill were proposed next year he should feel it to be his duty to move for a Committee of Inquiry to ascertain if there were any grounds for bringing forward such a measure. He would not divide the House on the present occasion. He must, however, contend that the Bill ought not to be an annual Bill—like the Mutiny Bill—to be passed without necessity or inquiry.

MR. M'CANN said, that after the expression of opinion last night, he would not offer any opposition to the Bill, though he agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Bowyer), that this Bill should not be brought in regularly as a matter of course every year. It might be necessary for one or two counties, but it was not just to apply it to all Ireland, when crime and outrage did not exist in many parts of that kingdom.

The Bill passed through Committee.
House resumed.

MILITIA (No. 2) BILL—ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming adjourned Debate on Question [31st July].

"That the Clause (All persons possessing diplomas, certificates, or qualifications held to qualify such persons to act as Surgeons, or Assistant Surgeons, in the Army, shall be held to be duly qualified to serve as Surgeons, or Assistant Surgeons, in the Militia,) be added to the Bill."

Debate resumed.

Question put, and agreed to.

Four other clauses added.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT moved the insertion in Clause 2 of a proviso, giving the magistrates of counties the power to add quarters for non-commissioned officers, cells, magazines, &c., to the militia store-houses, in place of the proviso originally contained in the clause, which rendered it compulsory upon the counties to provide these accommodations. The effect of this would be to limit the liability of the counties to what it had been under the former Act, the 42nd Geo. III.

MR. SOTHERON said, he thought the arrangement now proposed a very fair one, as the compulsory obligation was to be restricted to the limit which had been established for the last forty or fifty years, and everything else was to be left to the option of the magistrates at quarter sessions.

Amendment agreed to.

VISCOUNT JOCELYN said, he had upon a former occasion stated that it was, in his opinion, competent for a militia court-martial to try a sergeant upon the permanent staff, and to reduce that sergeant to the ranks if they thought the nature of the charge brought against him was such as to justify that course. He had since, however, come to the conclusion that it was extremely doubtful whether such court-martial could break a sergeant of the line who might have entered the militia as a volunteer. The point was one to which he wished that the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary at War should be directed.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that the Act which empowered a militia court-martial to reduce a sergeant to the rank of a private had been passed in the time of George III., when almost the whole of the governing staff consisted of volunteers, who had been promoted from the position of privates, and who might, therefore, by the decision of a court-martial, be reduced to the rank whence they sprung. Under the present system, however, there was a permanent staff, composed of volunteers of the line, who had never been privates in the militia, and therefore some difficulty arose as to the question whether they could be degraded to a rank which they had never held. According to the strict construction of the law, they might perhaps be so reduced, but as a matter of policy he doubted if it would not be more desirable that they should be dismissed the service altogether.

VISCOUNT JOCELYN said, that if such a person were guilty of a disgraceful offence, and could not be reduced to the rank of volunteer, all the punishment he could receive was dismissal from the militia regiment. He would retain his rank as sergeant of the line with a pension.

The remaining Amendments were then considered and agreed to, and the Bill ordered to be read a third time on Thursday next.

MILITIA (IRELAND) BILL.

The Order of the Day for the consideration of this Bill, as amended, having been read,

COLONEL DUNNE said, with respect to the appointment of the various officers in the militia, the power of making those appointments was proposed by the Bill to be vested in the lord lieutenant, who might have no military experience whatsoever. That was a state of things which he did not think it desirable should prevail, and he would therefore suggest to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary at War, that in Clause 8, instead of the words "Lord Lieutenant," there should be inserted, as was the case in the English Bill, the word "Queen."

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, the clause had been drawn up in strict conformity with the principle of the English Militia Bill. The appointments of the officers were, no doubt, subject to the approval of the Secretary of State; but practically what took place with reference to those appointments was, that the lord lieutenant of a county recommended a particular person to the colonel of a regiment, in whom, in reality, the appointment of its officers was vested.

The Bill, as amended, considered, and ordered to be read a third time on Thursday next.

RUSSIAN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES
BILL.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clause 1.

MR. HENLEY said, he must complain that, although the Bill had been postponed on a former occasion in consequence of the absence of the law officers of the Crown, those learned gentlemen were not now present.

LORD DUDLEY STUART said, it was not his fault that the law officers were not present. The Bill which he had introduced had been considerably altered by the hon. and learned Solicitor General; but, as the hon. and learned Gentleman was endeavouring to effect, though by better means, the object which he (Lord D. Stuart) was desirous of attaining, he could have no objection to the adoption of the Amendments proposed.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General, who had given notice of an Amendment for remodelling the clause, had told him that he was unable to attend at so early an hour, and had requested him to propose the Amendment of which he had given notice to the Committee. He thought it would be found that, by adopting the substitution now proposed, all the objections urged against the effects of the Bill would be removed, whilst, on the other hand, those political objects which his noble Friend (Lord D. Stuart) and the majority of the House had in view would be sufficiently accomplished. He would now move, as an Amendment, to leave out all the words of the Bill after the words "as follows," in line 7, for the purpose of inserting the following enactments—

"If, during the continuance of hostilities between Her Majesty and the Emperor of Russia, any British subject shall, in any country, wilfully or knowingly take, acquire, become possessed of, or interested in, any stocks, funds, scrip, bonds, debentures, or securities for money, which, since the 29th day of March, 1854, have or hath been, or which, during the continuance of hostilities as aforesaid, shall be created, issued, entered into, or secured by or in the name of the Government of Russia, or any person or persons on its behalf, every person so taking, acquiring, becoming possessed of, or interested in, any such stocks, funds, scrip, bonds, debentures or securities for money, as aforesaid, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon being convicted thereof, shall be imprisoned for a term of not less than three calendar months. Provided always, that the provisions of this Act shall not extend to or include the case of a British subject claiming an interest in the estate or effects of any deceased person, or the case of a British subject taking the estate or effects of his debtor in execution, or the case of a British subject claiming in any country to be interested under any bankruptcy, insolvency, sequestration, cessio bonorum, or disposition of property in trust for creditors, but that in every such case the British subject may take and receive any share, legacy, dividend, debt, or sum of money due or belonging to him, notwithstanding that the same may arise from or be produced by the sale or proceeds of any such stocks, funds, scrip, bonds, debentures, or securities for money as aforesaid."

MR. BARROW said, he thought the objects of the measure would be better carried out by the Bill in its original shape. The main object, as he understood it, was to prevent the Russian Government obtaining money by negotiations in Russian securities in this country, and he did not understand the Bill, as proposed by the noble Lord, to extend to any transactions in foreign countries. He perceived, however, that the proposed alteration of the Solicitor General made it an offence for a British subject in any country to deal in securities which, by the law of the country, it might be perfectly legitimate for parties to transfer from one hand to another. He entertained some doubt whether Parliament ought to interfere with transactions in foreign countries to that extent.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he thought the hon. Member would find, on reflection, that the Amendment was calculated to promote the object of the Bill. It was equally treasonable to advance money to the enemy in a foreign country as in this country, and one of the objections made to the Bill was, that it was so far short of its purpose that it would be easy to evade it by sending money to a foreign country.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought that the Amendment went to sweep out nearly the whole Bill for the purpose of substituting new enactments, and the Committee ought to know whether the Government now took charge of the Bill.

LORD DUDLEY STUART said, he had not stated that the Government had taken up the Bill, but the Solicitor General proposed to leave out all the words of the clause, in order to introduce another clause, which would carry out his (Lord D. Stuart's) views more effectually than the original clause. For his own part, he would be very glad if the Government would take charge of the Bill.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, he felt a greater aversion to this clause than he did to the original one. In effect they were now discussing an entirely new Bill. He considered it perfectly futile, and that it was impossible to carry it out. He understood the noble Lord to say the other day that it was futile to make a distinction between a direct and an indirect mode of doing the same thing. It appeared to him it was not impossible to make a distinction between a direct mode of aiding and abetting and lending money to a foreign Government with which we were at war, and an indirect mode of dealing with property which had become the property of other persons. By the declaration of Government they could receive goods, the produce of Russia, that were brought in in neutral bottoms, but by this Bill it would be unlawful to receive the amount in banknotes guaranteed by the Russian Government. He also objected to the Bill, because it was a direct interference with private property. It would make a difference in the value between two kinds of securities, those issued before the declaration of war and those issued since, and which were of equal intrinsic value. He entertained as great an aversion as any man to anything that would assist the enemy in the war, but this Bill would not cripple the resources of Russia; it was a paltry piece of legislation, and a puerile attempt to do that which they could not carry out.

MR. ROBERT PHILLIMORE said, that the Bill was extremely valuable, as recognising the principle that the will of the subject was bound up with the will of the Government to which he belonged, and that we were not to be allowed to carry on a military war and a commercial peace—a state of things which he conceived would be discreditable and dangerous to this country. The new regulations affecting neutral rights and relaxing the rigour of those formerly in force, constituted, in his view, an additional reason why this Bill should be passed, as we did not yet know what their operation might be.

MR. HENLEY said, the Bill, as it would now stand, aimed at an object quite different from that of the former Bill. As originally drawn, it would have enacted that no person, whether a British subject or a foreigner, should deal in Russian securities in this country, but it now provided that only British subjects should be detained from dealing in those securities, whilst they were to be restricted from doing so in all places. As the Bill was now drawn, those securities might circulate in the British market, and foreigners might deal in them freely. The noble Lord (Lord D. Stuart) originally omitted to prevent British subjects from dealing in those securities abroad, whereas the measure in its new form would render such dealings as illegal at Hamburg or Amsterdam as in London. The great difficulty of the clause as it now stood was, that if you took an execution against a foreigner, and thus obtained possession of a quantity of these securities, you might deal in them to any extent without let or hindrance. That seemed to him to open a door so wide, that it was a great question whether the Bill would not thus be evaded and entirely defeated, and he should like to hear the opinion of the Attorney General or Solicitor General on this point. The exceptions under the clause would be so very large and loose, that it seemed to him that any man might possess himself of these securities under a colourable process of law.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that it was exceedingly difficult, with respect to a subject such as that with which the Bill proposed to deal, to devise any form of words which would be found so comprehensive as to embrace all circumstances and all contingencies within their scope. His hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General had so applied his knowledge and ability as to meet these contingencies as far as possible, and the House ought not, in his opinion, to refuse its assent to the clause, because it failed to provide the exact remedy in every case that might occur. With reference to the objection which had been raised against the Bill, upon the ground that under its operation the foreigner might securely deal in Russian securities, he should merely say, that the foreigner was not to be regarded as being engaged in the contest with Russia, and that he might be allowed to carry on such transactions as those against which the Bill was directed without at all affecting the soundness or the utility of establishing the principle which the House was asked to sanction. It had also been urged in opposition to the Bill, that its provisions might without difficulty be evaded even by British subjects. Now, in answer to that argument, he should observe that it was his firm belief that when Parliament, by giving its assent to the measure before the House, had asserted a solemn principle, there would be little need of the introduction of minute provisions into the law for the purpose of securing for it the respect and obedience of the commercial classes of the community. He had a higher opinion of the good feeling and patriotism of Englishmen than to suppose that they would take advantage of those facilities of evading the law, which under the operation of the Bill they might be afforded. He was of opinion, also, that Parliament, having the subject under their consideration, should not hesitate to deal with it with decision and unanimity.

VISCOUNT GODERICH said, he wished to know whether any British soldier or sailor who might happen to become a prisoner of war, and who while in Russia might become possessed of a Russian bank-note, dated since the 29th of March last, would thereby be held to be guilty of a misdemeanor under the operation of the Bill?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: The provisions of the Bill are made to apply only to the case of those British subjects who became possessed of those notes while without the Russian dominions.

MR. J. WILSON said, the Committee had been placed in a considerable dilemma by the introduction of the Bill. If the measure had never been brought forward no harm would have been done; but if it were now rejected the motives of the Legislature might be seriously misrepresented. The hon. and learned Solicitor General had managed to remove some of the blots in the Bill as it was originally proposed, but there were still some defects remaining; and with a view to obviate such a case as the noble Lord (Viscount Goderich) had just pointed out, he would suggest some such proviso as the following—

“Provided always that nothing herein contained shall be considered to include notes which shall have been issued as a circulating medium in Russia, and shall be received by any British subject resident therein.”

His noble Friend (Lord Palmerston) had argued the other day that those who had opposed the Bill were above all things desirous of assisting Russia with money. Now he did not believe that any such wish or desire had any existence; and though the noble Lord had stated that what he (Mr. Wilson) said on a former occasion was “sheer nonsense,” he really thought the fate of the Bill must have convinced the noble Lord that those words would have been more applicable to the measure than to its opposers. At all events, not a single word of the original Bill had been retained. For his own part, he thought that the measure would be perfectly useless in preventing the raising of loans by Russia. The Committee of the Stock Exchange had of their own accord prohibited the Russian stock from being quoted in their lists, and had thus excluded it from the Exchange. The money dealers had thus anticipated the Bill, and they had done so in a much more effectual manner than could be done by any legislation, for what they had done would apply to foreigners as well as to British subjects.

MR. GLYN said, he would admit it was right that the Government should hold the power of saying to any of its subjects that they should not deal in the public securities of a country with which we were at war; but what he wished to impress on the Committee was, that in matters of this kind we had now arrived at a new state of things, and that the House of Commons ought to take upon itself to legislate for that new state of things. He confessed he thought this Bill ought originally to have been introduced by the Government, and upon a much broader basis. The Bill as originally drawn prevented all persons in this country from dealing with Russian securities, but now it appeared that it was British subjects alone in this country who were to be prohibited from negotiating such securities. He contended that that alteration would have the effect of making the Bill completely nugatory, inasmuch as there were numbers of foreigners on the Stock Exchange in London and in the other parts of the country, Dutchmen and others, who would thereby be enabled to deal in the securities in question with complete impunity.

LORD DUDLEY STUART said, he did not think that any difficulty would arise of the nature pointed out by the noble Lord below him (Viscount Goderich). The Bill was only directed against persons who “wilfully and knowingly” dealt in Russian securities; and it could not be said that an English prisoner in Russia who was obliged to take a Russian bank-note had done so “wilfully.” What he (Lord D. Stuart) wished to do was to throw difficulties in the way of Russia obtaining a loan; and he thought that if the contractors knew that their scrip would be shut out of the largest market in the world, they would think twice before they took the loan. He concurred in the objection against the insertion of the words "British subject;" unless, indeed, it was held that foreigners in this country were to be treated as subjects of these realms. He suggested that the words "for the first time," should be introduced so as to confine the operation of the Bill to the new stock.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that if the Bill had not been introduced, he, for one, should never have regretted its absence, because he thought it ought not to have been directed against one particular case alone. He thought it would have been more desirable to have given power to Her Majesty in Council to suspend the right of trafficking in the securities of foreign Governments; but, in his opinion, whatever was done ought to have assumed the form of a general measure. As, however, the measure had been introduced, it was very important to cripple the resources of the enemy by preventing as much as possible traffic from taking place in any loans he might attempt to raise. It was obvious that such a measure could not be so drawn as to meet every possible contingency which might arise, but, balancing its conveniences and its inconveniences, he thought the measure, on the whole, was a wise one, and his only objection to it was that it was a partial measure. As to the objection that the Bill would be nugatory, because it applied at present only to British subjects, he thought those words would not bear the limited construction sought to be put upon them, because every person residing in this country owed allegiance to its laws and was bound by them. It would be very easy, however, to get over this difficulty by inserting, instead of "any British subject," the words, "any person whatever within the realm of Great Britain and Ireland." He did not think, when the point came to be considered, that there would be any difficulty in so framing the clause as to meet most of the difficulties which had been urged against it.

MR. WILKINSON said, the whole effect of this Bill would be, to make perhaps one-half per cent difference in the money market between one description of Russian bonds and the other. By sending over to Amsterdam or elsewhere, new Russian bonds could be easily changed for old ones, and that would be the whole effect of the operation of this Bill. The fact was, the House of Commons should be satisfied with the general legislation already in force, which made it high treason to lend money to an enemy with whom we were at war. He felt bound to oppose the Bill altogether, believing, as he did, that it was beyond the scope of their legislation to effect the object they had in view, and feeling that, in legislating on the subject, at every step they took they only got out of one difficulty into another.

MR. T. BARING said, that the Bill was so full of difficulties, and so replete with anomalies, that if it were to pass in its present shape it would be found to be wholly inoperative. He perfectly concurred in the objections to the Bill to which the hon. and learned Attorney General had given expression. In fact, the difficulties in the way of dealing satisfactorily with the measure were considerably increased by the difference of opinion with respect to it which seemed to prevail among its supporters. The unusual conduct pursued by various Members of the Government with regard to this measure, while it afforded considerable amusement to his mind, tended also not a little to embarrass the House in dealing with it. The Bill, originally introduced by the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone, was afterwards taken under the protection of the noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Home Department. The Solicitor General afterwards came down to the House with a proposition which completely upset the Bill of the noble Lord the Secretary for the Home Department; and now the Attorney General appeared suddenly upon the scene with a suggestion which completely upset the Bill of the Solicitor General. Such was the state of confusion at which they had arrived. He perfectly concurred with the hon. and learned Attorney General in thinking that the House of Commons ought to legislate upon the subject under their notice upon general principles, applicable to every country—not merely with Russia—with which we might happen at any time to be at war. If the Government had adopted the policy of introducing a measure investing the authority in the Queen in Council to suspend the traffic in Russian securities upon the part of British subjects, such a policy would be plain and intelligible. But let him suppose that the Bill under their consideration should pass into law, and that during the recess war should be declared by Her Majesty against countries with which we were now at peace, what, he would ask, under these circumstances, would be the position in which we should find ourselves placed? That country might send its bonds here in the ordinary way, and we should be placed in this dilemma, that the dealing in the bonds of that country would be perfectly legal, whilst the dealing in those of Russia—we being at war with both countries—would be a misdemeanor punishable with three months imprisonment. Surely, if it was worth while to bring in a Bill on this subject at all, that Bill ought to proceed on a general principle. He believed, likewise, that the operation of the Bill would be found to be objectionable, upon the ground that it would throw great difficulties in the way of commercial transactions. The clause of the Solicitor General contained a proviso to the effect that the penalties to be inflicted for a violation of the provisions of the Bill should not apply to the case of a British subject claiming in any country to be interested under any bankruptcy; but that proviso would be found to give no security to the creditor for the payment of his debts. Let him take, for instance, the case in which a foreigner owed a large sum of money to a merchant in this country. That foreign debtor might, with a view of defrauding his creditor, convert all his property into the Russian bonds in question, and unless the Government could compel him by some legal process to become a bankrupt, the creditor would have no means of having his claims liquidated, inasmuch as he could not take the Russian securities, which constituted the only property which his debtor might possess. Under these circumstances it was evident that the operation of the Bill would be completely to deprive the British subject of the power to enforce the payment of his debts. The object of the measure was to prevent pecuniary assistance being rendered to the enemy, and that was a legitimate object, but they ought to seek its attainment only by reasonable and practicable means. It had been proposed that the provisions of the Bill should apply to all Russian securities—as well to those created before as to those created after the commencement of the war. But if that line of policy were pursued, and if it should happen that we became involved in a war with all the nations of Europe, what would, under these circumstances, become of British property. Even those great contests in which this country had in former years been engaged—contests quite as important, and, he hoped, more protracted than that in which we were now engaged would be found to be—contests during whose continuance the national energy had been taxed to the utmost—no measure such as that which they were discussing had been introduced for the sanction of Parliament. The wars to which he referred had been waged under the control of statesmen of great ability, among whom was Mr. Pitt; but these statesmen had not deemed it to be their duty to legislate as the noble Lord opposite proposed to do. Mr. Pitt had not attempted by legislating with regard to minutiae to hamper the trade or to endanger the commercial security of the country. Not alone had no such measure as that under their consideration been introduced during former wars, but no measure had had its progress through the House marked by so many amusing incidents. The history of the Bill was not a little remarkable. This Bill was originated by the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone (Lord D. Stuart), and although it had been supported more or less throughout by the noble Lord the Secretary for the Home Department, the Cabinet as a body, until quite recently, had made no sign in its favour. In the first stage of its discussion it appeared as if the hon. Member for Westbury (Mr. J. Wilson) had fascinated the Cabinet; that he had thrown them into a mesmeric trance, from which it required all the energy of the noble Lord the Secretary for the Home Department to arouse Her Majesty's Ministers. Upon a subsequent stage of the discussion that noble Lord had come down to the House, had used very strong language with respect to the arguments of the hon. Member for Westbury, and had carried the whole House with him. Then some hon. Members had signified it to be their opinion that the Bill did not go far enough; others thought that it wore the appearance of having been framed in a spirit of spite towards the Emperor of Russia; while the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midhurst (Mr. Walpole) complained that its operation would be retrospective. The noble Lord the Member for Marylebone had denied that its operation would be retrospective, thus clearly demonstrating to the House that he did not understand his own Bill; therefore it was of no use appealing to him to solve the various difficulties that had arisen. The law officers of the Crown, when those difficulties arose, were nowhere to be found, no one knew where they were; but the probability was that they were better occupied than in trying to lick into shape this deformed Marylebone abortion. Then, when a division had come to be taken with respect to the measure, there were found some truant Members of the Government running about the lobbies, to avoid recording their vote in favour of the views of the noble Lord the Secretary for the Home Department. Those various incidents had happened upon the occasion of the first discussion of the Bill in Committee, but nobody had expected that a similar entertainment would have been provided for the gratification of hon. Members so soon after. Her Majesty's Government seemed, however, resolved to cater very zealously for the amusement of the House. On Wednesday it was that the noble Lord the Secretary for the Home Department took his benefit; but on the following Thursday another actor appeared upon the stage in the person of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General. And if the noble Lord had rode rough-shod over the hon. Gentleman the Secretary of the Treasury, and performed his part entirely to the satisfaction of the House, the Solicitor General had certainly fallen very heavily upon the noble Lord. The noble Lord had stated that the arguments of the Secretary of the Treasury were "sheer nonsense," but the Solicitor General had spoken of the provisions of the Bill, of which the noble Lord had so warmly approved, as displaying a studious disregard of everything that ought to be attended to in drawing it up, and as requiring to be so altered, if it were to be reduced to a shape consistent with common sense and the laws of the country, that its parents would be totally unable to recognise their own offspring. He must also observe that that statement upon the part of the Solicitor General seemed to be somewhat strange, when it was considered that the Bill in question had previously been shown to the hon. and learned Gentleman by the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone, and that he had pronounced an opinion in its favour. Before them, then, was a measure with respect to which three distinguished Members of the Government entertained opinions entirely different. The Secretary for the Treasury, who was so conversant with all commercial matters, had disapproved of the Bill; the noble Lord the Secretary for the Home Department had considered the arguments of the Secretary of the Treasury as "sheer nonsense;" while the Solicitor

Mr. T. Baring

General had declared that not one word ought to be allowed to remain of a measure to which the noble Lord had given his earnest support. The Solicitor General had spoken against a Bill of which he had previously approved; while the Attorney General, who had come down to the House to-day, did not seem disposed to regard with any high degree of favour the clause of his hon. and learned Colleague. No doubt we English were a privileged people, and it was somewhat satisfactory to find that hon. Members need not travel beyond the walls of that House in order to see with how little wisdom the world was governed. But he would seriously put it to the Committee, whether it was advisable that they should stultify themselves by legislating in a hurry upon a subject with respect to which so great a difference of opinion existed in connection with the question under their consideration? or whether it would not be the better course to pursue to postpone the discussion of the measure until noble Lords and hon. Gentlemen opposite could make up their minds as to what they intended to do, and could devise some practical mode of carrying their intentions into effect? The noble Lord the Member for London, as well as the noble Lord the Secretary for the Home Department, seemed to be actuated by feelings of almost personal animosity towards the Emperor of Russia; but he felt assured that they would agree with him in thinking that it was desirable that our legislation, even when directed against our enemy, should be consistent with a wise policy and the dictates of common sense.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he thought the question now before the Committee was far more simple than the hon. Gentleman the Member for Huntingdon, with an evidently strong wish to defeat this Bill, had chosen to represent. It appeared to him (Lord J. Russell) that the question, as it had been brought before the House, was whether, it being an offence of no less than high treason to subscribe any money for the purpose of assisting in raising a loan for the Emperor of Russia, it should be a perfectly innocent act, and should constitute no offence whatever, two days after that loan had been made and the scrip issued, to take part of that scrip, and thereby, though not directly, yet evidently indirectly, assist the enemies of Her Majesty? That appeared to him to be the question now brought before the Committee. It might be said that this object should be attained in one way or in the other—that it ought to be attained by means of the words of the noble Lord who had brought forward the Bill, or those of his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General. He did not wish to interfere upon that question; but the point before the Committee was the simple one which he had stated. It appeared that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. T. Baring) took great offence because this Bill applied only to Russia. Well, the only reason it applied to the Emperor of Russia was, that the Emperor of Russia was the only Power with whom we happened to be at war. The hon. Gentleman said, and very truly, it was possible—but he hoped no such contingency would arise—that during the recess Her Majesty might think fit to declare war against some other Power. He (Lord J. Russell) imagined, however, if such an occasion should arise, that Her Majesty, without any reference to a thing so comparatively unimportant as a Bill of this kind, would immediately assemble Parliament. Her Majesty would never think of declaring war against any Power without assembling Parliament, and declaring the reasons for so doing. The objection of the hon. Gentleman in that respect, then, was at once disposed of. But, then, the hon. Gentleman thought that his noble Friend (Lord Palmerston) and himself could not have taken the strong part they had taken in this matter, and given their support to this Bill, without having some personal animosity against the Emperor of Russia. Now, he thought he could answer for his noble Friend as well as for himself that, having been concerned in the affairs of the country for many years, they had never thought of entertaining any animosity against the Emperor of Russia, and that, so far from this, during a great part of the time they had been in office, the most friendly relations had been maintained with the Emperor. When, however, the Emperor of Russia disturbed the peace of Europe, and became an aggressive Power against one of the other Powers of Europe, it was not to be borne that his noble Friend and he could not speak as they thought of that aggression, and support what measures they thought calculated to prevent it, without being told that they were animated by private animosities. The hon. Gentleman seemed to think it a great hardship that British subjects should not be allowed to deal with Russian scrip, but that was not the opinion of the Committee of the Stock Exchange, who had thought it right and decent, seeing that the Emperor of Russia was an enemy of Her Majesty, to forbid, by a rule of their own, any Russian scrip whatever from being dealt in publicly on the Stock Exchange. Why should the House of Commons, therefore, have less patriotism than the Committee of the Stock Exchange? If that body had done everything in their power to prevent such dealings, why should not the House of Commons go so far as to say that no such scrip should be dealt in without subjecting the offender to punishment? The hon. Gentleman said that Mr. Pitt had never proposed such a thing. Well, the measures proposed by different Governments during war, or during circumstances which approached to war, had been according to the necessities and to the policy of the time. He thought that in the course of the last century some Bill with respect to lending money to foreign Powers had been introduced, but whether this were the case or not, Mr. Pitt, no doubt, found that the enemy with whom he had to deal levied great war contributions and by forced loans carried on the war. He did not suppose Mr. Pitt found that any loan at that time was likely to come upon the Stock Exchange. If he had found that such trafficking existed, or was likely to exist, he would, without doubt, have proposed to deal with it; but no such occasion arose. But then it was said by the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. Wilkinson) that the only effect of this Bill would be to make the scrip of this Russian loan somewhat lower in the market than it would otherwise be. That might be the case. The scrip might be sent over to Holland and dealt in there. The practical effect of the measure might not be very great. He did not himself believe it would be very great. But he thought it would be desirable if, by an Act of Parliament, you did place at some disadvantage scrip issued for the purpose of enabling the Emperor of Russia to carry on war with this country. The measure would, it was said by the hon. Member for Lambeth, not lower the value of Russian scrip by more than $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, but, if it did not do so by more than $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent, he thought it was proper and becoming to legislate upon the subject. Whether or no it was worth while for his noble Friend (Lord D. Stuart) to bring in such a Bill was not a question upon which he should give an opinion. The question now before the Committee was whether, this Bill having been introduced, they should think it proper that, while it was high treason to advance money to the Emperor of Russia, it should be no offence to deal in the scrip of that country.

Mr. WALPOLE said, he thought that the noble Lord President of the Council entirely mistook the meaning of a remark of his hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. T. Baring) when he supposed that his hon. Friend meant to state that either the noble Lord himself or the noble Lord the Secretary for the Home Department were actuated by personal animosity to the Emperor of Russia in undertaking or in conducting the war. He was sure no one could have observed the conduct of both the noble Lords upon that question without feeling convinced that they were actuated solely by a sense of national honour, and a determination to preserve the independence of Europe. It appeared to him that the noble Lord had put the leading facts of that case fairly before the Committee. It was an act of high treason to negotiate a loan for a Power with which we were at war, and they were then asked to consider whether they should prevent any dealing on the part of British subjects in the scrip of a loan which had been contracted by a hostile Power. Now, he should have no objection to their attempting to effect that latter object if he thought that they could succeed in that attempt. But his belief was that they could not so succeed, and that the Bill would be inoperative, except in as far as it would hamper the merchants of this country in their commercial transactions. The noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) had said that Mr. Pitt had not proposed such a measure as that merely because he had not found any necessity for its introduction in his time. But he (Mr. Walpole) had always understood—although he could not justify the opinion by citing any positive authority upon the point—that the policy of bringing forward such a Bill had been considered by the Government of Mr. Pitt, and that that Government had not adopted that course merely because they had believed that the Bill would have been utterly impracticable. Let the Committee see whether the measure they were then considering could be carried into operation. That

Bill was, as he understood, the amended one proposed by the hon. and learned Solicitor General; and under its first provisions it was enacted that—

Now, it seemed to him that various objections might be urged against that provision. In the first place he would ask why should they not extend it to strangers residing in this country. In the second place, he should observe that he did not see why its operation was to be confined to securities issued by Russia; and in the third place, they furnished no means of enabling parties dealing in Russian securities to ascertain whether those securities were portions of the old or of the new loan. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General had himself thought proper to introduce an important modification of that first provision; for he had gone on to propose that—

“The provisions of this Act shall not extend to or include the case of a British subject claiming an interest in the estate or effects of any deceased person, or the case of a British subject taking the estate or effects of his debtor in execution, or the case of a British subject claiming in any country to be interested under any bankruptcy, insolvency, sequestration, cessio bonorum, or disposition of property in trust for creditors, but that in every such case the British subject may take and receive any share, legacy, dividend, debt, or sum of money due or belonging to him, notwithstanding that the same may arise from or be produced by the sale or proceeds of any such stocks, funds, scrip, bonds, debentures, or securities for money as aforesaid.”

It appeared, therefore, that in the case of the property of debtors, deceased persons, and insolvents, the Bill was not to be enforced. But such an arrangement would necessarily open the door to all sorts of evasions of the law. Thus, if a man held these securities, all he had to do was to assign them over to two trustees and then they could be sold in open market for the benefit of all the creditors. Either this would be done, or you would drive a man into insolvency for the purpose of paying his debts. Then, again, the question arose, when once you got all these securities so sold in open market—whether they were the goods of a bankrupt or of a deceased person—how could you ever distinguish between them and securities to dispose of which would constitute a misdemeanor? Then came the question as to how this matter was to be dealt with. The noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Home Department had, on a previous occasion, stated that if this Bill were rejected, it might lead to an impression that the House of Commons was not in earnest in the matter of carrying on the war. There was, undoubtedly, great force in that argument, and he, for one, consequently would not be willing to be a party to the rejection of this Bill. He would, however, suggest to the noble Lord that, instead of rejecting this Bill, the Government should bring in a general measure enabling the Queen, by an Order in Council, to forbid British subjects negotiating loans with any country with which we might happen to be at war, and placing that Power under such restriction as might be thought expedient.

MR. WARNER said, he thought that, in the present case, as the country was only at war with Russia, the subject of loans to that Power need only be considered. He thought that the measure of the hon. and learned Solicitor General would not meet the object which ought always to be kept in view, namely, that of crippling the resources of Russia, but by the introduction of a few slight amendments it might be made all that was necessary. If it were desired to render the measure efficient it was not desirable to endeavour to do so by mere penal enactments, but, if any transactions in Russian securities were declared void, he thought that the Bill would be rendered much more effective.

MR. BRIGHT said, that although he had not heard the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. T. Baring), he concluded, from the reply of the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) to that speech, that the hon. Gentleman had charged him with having been actuated by personal animosity in the course he had pursued towards the Emperor of Russia. The noble Lord, it might be supposed, had been influenced in that case by that feeling of hostility which people frequently entertained against those who had driven them into a policy which had been beset with difficulties and failures. The noble Lord and the noble Viscount the Secretary for the Home Department were the only statesmen in Europe who had, unhappily, descended to personal vituperation of the Emperor of Russia. Their language in that respect strongly contrasted with the dignified tone preserved by the French Government throughout those transactions; and he should further observe that the French press had taken upon the same subject a line far more in accordance with decency and propriety than that which had been taken by the press of this country. The noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) had assumed that those who were opposed to this Bill were favourable to the policy of Russia, and that those only who supported it were endowed with patriotism, and he had referred to the patriotism of the Stock Exchange. Now, he (Mr. Bright) did not ascribe to the members of the Stock Exchange any more patriotism than to the rest of their fellow-countrymen, and he did not think that, because a particular course had been adopted by the Stock Exchange, that was any reason for its being adopted by that House, which ought not under any circumstance to legislate without believing that the measure agreed to would fulfil the objects which it had in view. Now, what was the case with regard to the present Bill? Every one in that House was convinced that they were engaged in discussing a sham, more complete, more hollow, and more childish than had ever been brought before any legislative assembly. No one knew that better than the noble Lord the Secretary for the Home Department, who had himself offered the measure to the House as what he called a "moral demonstration." He (Mr. Bright) thought a moral demonstration exceedingly valuable under certain circumstances; but he considered it perfectly useless when it came after vast fleets and armies had been sent forth against an enemy. There were circumstances under which he did not see how the Bill could be applied. He believed there were at present at least 1,500 British subjects carrying on in Russia, as they had a right to do, without violating our laws, various branches of business on which their means of existence depended; he took it for granted that the House did not wish to make those men criminals, or to effect their ruin; and if any of them were to deal in those Russian securities he should like to know whether they would be guilty of a misdemeanor, and whether they would render themselves liable to imprisonment? Then, again, how would they deal with the case of Englishmen having in some foreign country partners in trade who had purchased some of those securities? Were those Englishmen to be punished for acts of their partners in which they had become interested? He believed that the "moral demonstration" of the noble Lord the Secretary for the Home Department would not be effected by that Bill any more than it would be effected by a Resolution of that House declaring that every British subject who should afford assistance to Russia while Russia was at war with England would be acting in a manner hostile to the interests of his own country. By one of those provisions it was proposed that the only bonds to which the Bill should apply were those which had been issued by Russia since the 29th of March last. But what would there be to prevent the Emperor of Russia from frustrating, if he should think proper, the whole object of the measure by dating his bonds from an earlier day? The Bill would be perfectly inoperative for any useful purpose, and he hoped that the Government would not continue to press it through the House.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that the hon. Gentleman had accused him of personal vituperation of the Emperor of Russia. Now, he entirely denied the justice of that accusation. He had only spoken of acts done under the authority of the Emperor of Russia; he had spoken of the note sent by Russia in answer to what was called the Vienna note, and he had spoken of the attack of Sinope, in the language which he thought those notes and that attack deserved. But he denied that his language had borne the character of personal vituperation. It had been applied, he repeated, to acts done under the authority of the Emperor of Russia, and if a Member of that House could not speak of such acts in terms of blame, there would be an end to freedom of discussion.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midhurst (Mr. Walpole) had expressed a qualified concurrence in the suggestion thrown out by his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, that it would be better to bring in a general Bill, giving to the Government power of dealing, by means of an Order in Council, with cases of the kind now under consideration. Now, that was certainly a suggestion well deserving of attention; but he thought the

Mr. Bright

Committee would feel that at that period of the Session, when its duration was counted by days, it would be impossible for them to pass a measure which would necessarily require a good deal of consideration. The question, therefore, lay between passing the present Bill or doing nothing during the present Session. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Manchester had re-echoed the expressions of the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. T. Baring), charging the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) and himself with having been actuated in the policy they had adopted, and the language they had used towards Russia, by a mean—[Mr. BRIGHT: No, I did not say it]—by a mean and unworthy feeling of personal hostility. [Mr. BRIGHT: No.] The hon. Member had certainly said that, and so had the hon. Member for Huntingdon. But that was an egregious misrepresentation, propagated by that party in Europe which had for many years opposed the policy of this country. It was just as the hon. Gentleman the Member for Manchester had said—people were apt to get angry with those who thwarted their measures; and that was true of Governments and of States as well as of individuals. It had been a regular manœuvre of the absolutist party in Europe, when they felt that the Government of this country were pursuing a policy in variance with their views and interests, to impute to him (Viscount Palmerston) and to other Members of the Government feelings of personal animosity to particular individuals. That was just as regular a practice in diplomatic manœuvres as the thrust over guard and other movements in the small-sword exercise. He was not surprised that the hon. Member for Manchester should have adopted that practice. [Mr. BRIGHT: I did not adopt it.] But he was really surprised that the hon. Member for Huntingdon should have made himself the organ of that sort of ridiculous calumny, because he thought that if there were a man in that House who ought to have abstained from adopting that line of accusation upon the present occasion, it was that hon. Gentleman, who was known and avowed as the private agent of the Emperor of Russia. He thought, therefore, that there were circumstances connected with the hon. Member's position with regard to the Russian Government which ought to have made him abstain from casting those unjust imputations on Members of Her Majesty's Government. He, like his noble Friend (Lord J. Russell), had thought himself perfectly free to express his opinions as to the conduct of the Russian Government. If that Government happened to be swayed in its actions by one individual, the expressions he had used with respect to it might or might not apply to the individual who possessed that arbitrary power. But he certainly would not be deterred by any taunts from expressing with the utmost freedom in that House, or in any other place in which the occasion might require it, his opinions as to the conduct of foreign Governments in connection with their relations with the Government of this country. The hon. Member for Manchester was very difficult to please; because when proposals were made to resist an injury to this country, or to defend its interests by force, the hon. Gentleman opposed the employment of force, and was then all for moral demonstrations; but when he (Viscount Palmerston) recommended that Bill, because, among other considerations in its favour, it would serve as a moral demonstration, the hon. Member asked, what would the Emperor of Russia care for a moral demonstration, and told them to employ their armies and their fleets, as the only means of influencing the enemy with whom they had become engaged. That champion of peace was so very peaceable that he had objected to the war from the beginning to the end; and he would, therefore, neither allow them to proceed by military and naval demonstrations, nor even by moral demonstrations. The hon. Gentleman was perfectly entitled to his opinions; he (Viscount Palmerston) certainly did not think they were the opinions of the country; and when the hon. Gentleman told them what he had heard in private conversations with different individuals in reference to that Bill, he (Viscount Palmerston) would only say that he should be sorry to state what he had heard in private conversations in reference to the arguments of those who had opposed the Bill. He supported the Bill on the grounds he had already stated; he thought this noble Friend (Lord D. Stuart) had been right in bringing it forward; but at all events it had been submitted to the consideration of the House, and its principle had been sanctioned by a very considerable majority of hon. Members; and under those circumstances he believed it would not be for the interest of the country that it should be rejected on the ground of its being open to mere verbal criticisms. His hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. J. Wilson) had pointed out two Amendments which in his (Viscount Palmerston's) opinion would remove some of the objections to the measure without interfering with its principle; and if the clause should then be read a second time, an opportunity would be afforded to him or to any other hon. Member to propose any Amendments they might think proper on the bringing up of the report.

MR. T. BARING: I wish to say a few words in explanation to the Committee. The noble Lord has stated that I am the private agent of the Government of Russia, but I beg to tell the noble Lord that such is not the case. In time of peace I have been the agent of the Russian Government, so far as the firm of which I am a member negotiating a loan for that Government could make me so; but I must remind the noble Lord that, after the failure of a well-known house, the Bank of England, on the recommendation of the late Sir Robert Peel, became the private agent of the Russian Government. If the noble Lord, therefore, means to say that I ought to be silent upon this subject on account of any connection I may have had with the Russian Government, I must tell the noble Lord that, as far as I know, my opinions are as conscientiously entertained as those of the noble Lord himself. Language may have fallen from me which went further than I intended; but what I intended to say was, that the fact of the Government having remained three months without bringing such a Bill as this before the House must be attributed to their belief in its inutility, and not to any want of animosity on their parts to Russia. I do not hesitate to say that the language of the two noble Lords, coming from such high quarters, and directed against a foreign Government with which we had been so long in intimate alliance—I do not hesitate to say that that language appeared to me at the time, and appears to me still, indecorous. But I certainly did not intend to convey the opinion that, in my humble judgment, that language was dictated by any personal spite or private animosity.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I have no wish to state anything with reference to any hon. Member which would be inconsistent with the truth. I certainly, however, did understand that the hon. Member was the private agent of the Russian Government, although not in such a manner as would be in the least compatible with the highest sense of duty; and I did understand that when a Turkish agent was not long ago in this country for the purpose of negotiating a loan for his Government, an application was made by him, among other applications, to the firm to which the hon. Gentleman belongs, and that they declined to have anything to do with that loan, on the ground of their financial connection with the Russian Government. If I have been misinformed upon that point, I should of course be glad to be corrected by the hon. Gentleman.

MR. T. BARING: Perhaps I may just as well state that there were other reasons for our declining to engage in that loan. We did not think the security very good; we did not believe that a Turkish loan would succeed without a guarantee from England and France; and we said, in addition, that we did not think it would be becoming in us to undertake the management of such a loan, after having a few years before, negotiated a loan for the Russian Government, with which the Turkish Government was at war.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Am I to understand that the connection of the firm with the Russian Government was not assigned as a reason for declining to engage in that loan?

MR. T. BARING: I am not aware that it was; I was not the person who communicated with the Turkish agent; but my impression is that it was not.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I am glad to hear from the hon. Gentleman that he does not intend to attribute the language used by my noble Friend and myself, with regard to the conduct of the Russian Government, to feelings of personal animosity. That is all I wished; and, with regard to whether that language was decorous or not, the hon. Gentleman is of course entitled to form his own opinion.

MR. DISRAELI: I quite sympathise with what has fallen from the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston), and with the indignation which he must feel at the imputation of personal motives influencing his political conduct. I think that is a very reasonable feeling, and I do not know any living statesman more sinned against in that respect than the noble Lord. About five or six years ago a stream of calumny in that vein was poured upon the noble Lord. The noble Lord was at that time in the responsible position of influencing the policy of this country during the occurrence of the most important events of modern times, and he was assailed by persons of position and authority on the ground that he was influenced in the course of policy which he adopted by personal motives. Now, who was the principal individual who at that time assailed the noble Lord? It was the present Prime Minister of England, under whom the noble Lord now holds office. And who were the persons who supported those calumnious accusations? They were the followers of the present head of the Government, and are now colleagues of the noble Lord. I merely recall the attention of the Committee to this circumstance in order that they may do justice to the amiable disposition of the noble Lord; and they, perhaps, may feel that the indignation which has been lavished upon a chance, and probably misunderstood, phrase, might have been directed against those much more entitled to be complained of than my hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, he had understood the hon. and learned Attorney General to say that, at this period of the Session, it was a waste of time to indulge in personalities; and he would go further, and say that, at this period of the Session, it was a waste of time to continue to discuss a measure like the present. It was not, in his opinion, consistent with the proceedings of that House that an entirely new Bill, such as this in reality was, should be introduced in Committee. He would ask any hon. Member who had read the Amendment if this was not a completely new Bill? The Bill was one which, in his opinion, would not do the least possible harm to the Russian Government, but which would recoil on this country, and he would put it to his noble Friend whether it would not be better to withdraw the present Bill, and to bring in a short Bill on the subject.

MR. J. A. SMITH said, he was one of those who came down to the House prepared to give his most hearty support to the Bill of the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone; and for this reason, that he thought an act which was admitted to be treasonable should not escape without punishment. The discussion which had taken place had very strongly confirmed that opinion, and he was astonished that the hon. Member for Huntingdon, in his amusing and ingenious speech, had directed his attention more to the manner in which the Bill had been introduced than to the principle of the Bill itself.

It was a remarkable fact that every Member who had spoken against the Bill, having drawn the most lamentable picture of the evils to English commerce and to individuals, which would arise from the measure, stated at the same time that the Bill should be made general, and that they would be prepared to support it in that shape. He could not understand what effect such a general Bill could have except to increase indefinitely the very evils which were apprehended by those hon. Members from the operation of the present measure. He was greatly astonished at some of the objections which had been urged against the Bill by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midhurst (Mr. Walpole). The right hon. Gentleman had stated that executors were to be enabled to hold Russian stock, that they were to have the power of selling that stock, and that, therefore, the Bill would be inoperative, at least so far as such cases were concerned. But the right hon. Gentleman seemed entirely to forget that the Bill interdicted the purchase of such stock. [Mr. WALPOLE: The Bill does nothing of the kind.] At all events, although executors might sell, the power of buying was taken away, the purchase of Russian stock being in fact made a penal act. It was upon that very ground that he supported the present Bill. The hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Hankey), in his eagerness to defeat the Bill, had stated that if the power of negotiating loans was taken away from Russia, it would be utterly impossible for Russia to pay the dividends upon her existing loans. Well, the answer to that was this—that while the inconvenience produced to the holders of Russian stock would give him great pain, he could not but feel that it was the duty of the Legislature to do everything they could to cripple the resources of Russia at the present moment, and that no consideration affecting private individuals should be allowed to stand in the way of the attainment of that great and important object. He believed it to be right that Russian loans should not be negotiated in England, and that being so, he thought that the purchasing of such securities by British subjects should be held to be an act punishable by fine or imprisonment.

Mr. BARROW said, the Bill had been denounced as a measure interfering with private property. But private property was only interfered with if it existed at the present moment in the hands of any British subject. He challenged the opponents of the measure to show that such property was held at present by British subjects. The object of the Bill was to prevent the holding of Russian stock in future, and he denied that any executor could sell any such stock in future in the English market. [Mr. WALPOLE: Yes, he could.] If that was so, the clause proposed by the hon. and learned Solicitor General differed to that extent from the Bill as originally introduced by the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone.

Mr. MASSEY moved that the Chairman report progress.

Mr. BRIGHT said, before the question was put he wished to have one matter explained by the hon. and learned Attorney General. It was well known that many English houses had partners abroad who were not British subjects. As he (Mr. Bright) read this Bill, it appeared to him that these partners in foreign countries, not British subjects, becoming possessed of securities of this nature, it was clear the Englishman residing at home would be interested in them, and therefore would become liable to the provisions of this Bill. He wished to know if such would not be the effect?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he had no hesitation in saying that an Englishman would not be affected by what was done by the partner abroad, unless he adopted the act as that of his own.

LORD DUDLEY STUART hoped the hon. Gentleman would not press his Motion for reporting progress.

LORD SEYMOUR said, he thought it well that he should. He preferred the Bill of the hon. and learned Solicitor General to that of the noble Lord (Lord D. Stuart), and therefore hoped a division would be taken on the question of reporting progress.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report progress, and ask leave to sit again."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 30; Noes 88: Majority 58.

Mr. T. BARING said, that under the terms of the clause a British subject, being a stockbroker at Amsterdam or elsewhere, would be obliged to refuse to sell Russian stock for any of his customers. He thought that would operate as a great hardship.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he would admit that a British subject, though a stockbroker resident abroad, would be liable to the penalties of the Bill if he transacted business of the nature described; but it was impossible to make a distinction between stockbrokers and other persons. He intended to add a proviso to the clause, declaring that nothing therein contained should preclude the acceptance of Russian Government notes used as a circulating medium in the Russian dominions, so far as the same might be received by British subjects resident therein.

MR. HENLEY said, he begged to inquire whether a foreigner who had purchased Russian scrip after the passing of this Bill would be liable to be apprehended and imprisoned, in the event of his coming over to this country at any subsequent period.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Certainly not; because he would not come under the description of a person residing in this country at the time when the act was done.

MR. WALPOLE said, the answer of the hon. and learned Gentleman increased the difficulty, inasmuch as a foreigner who had purchased Russian stock abroad, and who had subsequently come into this country, might dispose of such stock to parties residing here.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, a foreigner could not do so, because he would get no person to buy his stock.

MR. WALPOLE said, the executors of deceased persons and the assignees of bankrupts were excepted from the provisions of the Bill. Now, it would be necessary that those parties should be at liberty to dispose of the Russian stock in their hands, in order that the proceeds might be distributed, in the one case among the relatives of the deceased persons, and in the other among the creditors of the insolvents; and that being so, those securities might possibly find their way into the English market, and it would be impossible to distinguish them from securities which had been knowingly and wilfully acquired by other persons not executors or assignees.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the difficulty presented by the right hon. Gentleman arose from an assumption that securities held by executors or assignees might find their way into the English market. He did not see any possibility of that. He admitted that it would be necessary for executors and assignees, in the discharge of their duty, to sell such property; but they could not do so in England, inasmuch as it would be illegal for any party residing in this country to deal in them.

MR. WALPOLE: Then I suppose these securities must be sold abroad.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: They must.

MR. SPOONER said, it appeared to him that the dealings of executors and assignees in Russian securities were excepted altogether from the provisions of the Bill.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, it was not so; the acquisition of such property by executors and assignees was only exempted from the penalties contained in the Bill.

MR. HENLEY said, he feared the words "British subject claiming an interest in the estate or effects of any deceased person" would not include executors.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, in the majority of instances these would be cases of persons dying abroad, and as the mode of administration differed, and in many countries there was no such thing as executors, it was necessary to use general words, but he thought these words would include executors.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he had been unavoidably absent when the discussion took place on the second reading of the Bill, but he wished to take the earliest opportunity of stating that, even with the safeguards which it was the object of the clause to create, the Bill appeared to him to be most dangerous and unjust in its tendency. He agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman that these words would include executors. There was another case not provided for. Suppose a British subject to be connected with a foreign house—say at Hamburg or at Amsterdam—and that that house should acquire an interest in property of this description, he thought the Bill, as at present framed, would operate most unjustly towards that person; and would expose such British subject, who was perfectly innocent, to great inconvenience. He might be one of a firm of four or five, all the rest being Germans, and who, as foreign merchants, might abroad do acts which an English subject in this country could not legally do. How was that English partner of this foreign house to be affected? His partners might contract a loan with the Emperor of Russia. The British partner would have no power to prevent it, nor could he immediately dissolve partnership, and thus he might against his will become a subscriber to a foreign loan and a purchaser of foreign stock, which act was rendered penal by this Bill. He could not help saying, generally, that he considered the Bill itself to be totally unnecessary. It did not prohibit by law anything which was not prohibited by law already, and it did not make that a criminal offence which was not already a criminal offence. He hoped, at all events, that his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General would turn his attention to the case he had suggested, which was no imaginary case, as he knew of the existence of one exactly as he had described it. If the Bill passed at all, this exemption clause ought to go a great deal further, and comprise every possible case in which persons might innocently become interested directly or indirectly in Russian stock.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that the case which had been put by his hon. and learned Friend was one of the difficulties which must necessarily arise, and was one, therefore, which ought to induce hon. Members to consider whether they would assent to the Bill or not. It was impossible to carry the exceptional clause any further. But, if a partner should repudiate the acts of his co-partners in any transaction such as had been put by his hon. and learned Friend, he thought that might prevent his becoming liable under the provisions of this Bill. With regard to the objections which had been urged by the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), he promised to give them the fullest consideration before they proceeded further with the Bill.

MR. T. BARING said, he thought that the provisions of the Bill would throw a great impediment in the way of trade, and would make the transactions of English merchants with neutral countries most insecure. It often happened that an English merchant could obtain no other security for his claims on a foreign merchant than the transference of shares and scrips of the description which this Bill dealt with, and which the English merchant was very glad to obtain. But if those securities were not available in his hands, it might probably happen that he would not be able to meet his engagements in this country, and thus he might himself be made a bankrupt, although he might be perfectly solvent, supposing such an Act as the one under discussion had not passed into a law.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, the objection was perfectly unanswered. The truth was, the law already was quite sufficient to prevent English merchants making themselves original parties in these loans, but if impediments were to be thrown in the way of commercial operations, by forbidding these being received, he would endeavour to make the measure as little mischievous as possible, by introducing a clause on the bringing up of the report. Should that clause be rejected, he would divide the House against the Bill.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

LORD DUDLEY STUART said, he wished to ask, now that the original clause in the Bill had been struck out, and one prepared by the law officers of the Crown had been substituted, whether the Government would not be prepared to take the Bill into their own hands, and relieve him from all further responsibility?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he supposed the Government must accede to the request of the noble Lord.

LORD DUDLEY STUART said, he was very glad to hear that statement, and he had no doubt this measure, which had been called the Marylebone abortion, would grow up to maturity, and render good and efficient service to the country.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought it would be only right that, instead of the names of the noble Lord (Lord D. Stuart) and of the hon. and learned Member for Youghal (Mr. I. Butt), the names of the noble Lord the Secretary of State (Lord Palmerston) and of the hon. Secretary of the Treasury (Mr. Wilson) should now be put on the back of the Bill.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered on Friday.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said it represented exactly the Bill which went up to the other House, with certain changes suggested by the Committee of the Lords, to whom it was referred.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he objected to the Bill as unfair and inequitable. It brought into the Estimates the salaries of officers who were entitled under Acts of Parliament, and whilst excepting some officials in England, included others of similar position in Ireland. He thought it would be much better, and much more satisfactory to those Gentlemen who opposed the Bill upon principle, if the right hon. Gentleman would take the whole subject into consideration between this and the next Session, and then present the Bill in an amended form.

COLONEL DUNNE said, as a proof that his objections to this Bill had not been unreasonable, he might refer to the fact that the Government had consented to strike out of the schedule every one of the offices which he had contended ought not to remain in it, namely, offices of a judicial character in Ireland. He had maintained that those offices ought not to be subject to the annual Vote of Parliament, and that principle had been conceded. He should not offer any opposition to the second reading of the Bill in its amended form, but he was authorised to say that many Members of the House of Lords did not look upon the alterations by the Select Committee of that House as meeting all the objections which might fairly have been made to the measure, but regarded them merely as specimens of the kind of alteration which it required.

Bill read 2°.

SUPPLY—ORDNANCE ESTIMATES.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

(1.) 1,040 additional men, Royal Artillery.

CAPTAIN LEICESTER VERNON said, he rose for the purpose of directing attention to the recent appointment of Sir Hew Ross to the office of Lieutenant General of the Ordnance, over the head of his senior officer, Sir John Burgoyne. He felt it to be his duty, as one of a corps over which Sir John Burgoyne presided, to bring this subject under the consideration of the Committee. He did this with no feeling of personal hostility to Sir Hew Ross, it referred to military discipline alone, and his object was to ascertain why, in this case, the rules of the service had been departed from, and a junior officer been placed in command of a senior officer, contrary to the custom of the service, and to the terms of Her Majesty's regulations. He was aware that the Crown, in the exercise of its prerogative, had power to make any such appointment, but he trusted he might be permitted to inquire why, at such a time, at the commencement of a great war, so large a deviation from the regulations of the Army should have been advised, a deviation affecting injuriously an officer of high rank and long standing? It would be in the recollection of the Committee that, at the outset of the war, Sir

John Burgoyne was despatched on a special mission to the East to examine and report upon the seat of war. The Committee might not be aware that, in his position as Inspector General of Fortifications, he could in no way be expected to undertake such a duty; nevertheless he volunteered his services. How those services were performed and appreciated his superior could state. As long as he continued so employed, the Master General of the Ordnance, Lord Raglan, who had been appointed to command the British forces in the East, remained in England, receiving the information transmitted by Sir John Burgoyne. When he returned Lord Raglan took his departure. Now, the absence of the Master General from his office necessitated the revival of the Lieutenant Generalship of the Ordnance—a strictly military position; and a few days previously to the return of Sir John Burgoyne his junior officer, Sir Hew Ross, was appointed Lieutenant General of the Ordnance, thus placing him in immediate command of the Inspector General of Fortifications. The two offices were closely and intimately connected. In the absence of the Master General, the Lieutenant General of Ordnance was in daily communication with the Inspector General of Fortifications, and thus Sir John Burgoyne had daily the mortification of being commanded by, and of receiving the orders of, an officer of inferior rank. When he said an officer of inferior rank, he did not mean inferior in departmental, professional position, or in military merit; he meant merely in rank in the Army. Now, for a superior officer to be under the command of an inferior officer was contrary to the custom and usage of the service, and could not fail to be detrimental to good discipline. It was understood that his Grace the Duke of Newcastle, the Secretary for the War Department, had said that the reason Sir John Burgoyne was not appointed Lieutenant General of the Ordnance was, that it was desirable to keep him free, so that his valuable services might be available for the East—a most reasonable arrangement. Now, however, it was said that he could not be sent to the East, because his valuable services were so much required at home. That he (Captain Vernon) could readily believe; but was it reasonable or just that this officer's great abilities should thus be made to cut two ways—and in both ways against himself? Was it reasonable or just that, for the good of the service, he should be placed in a position not recognised by the service—that of a superior officer commanded by an inferior officer? It was not for him to give an opinion of Sir John Burgoyne's qualifications—that officer had a world-wide reputation. His honours were gained by the sword. His Star of the Bath was obtained when that decoration proclaimed eminent services in the field. The orders he wore did not more adorn his merit, than by his merit they were adorned. That merit was recognised in this kingdom, in France, and in the East, the quarter where last he was employed. In justice, then, to that merit, to a service extending over more than half a century, and in justice to the corps of Royal Engineers, which was proud to have Sir John Burgoyne at its head, and which felt a slight to him as a wound to itself, he asked for such an explanation of the appointment as would vindicate Sir John Burgoyne and the authorities.

MR. MONSELL said, he trusted he need not assure the hon. and gallant Gentleman that the Government had not intended to cast any slur upon Sir John Burgoyne. It was impossible that any one could imagine that they had intended to do otherwise than to pay him that high respect which was due to his distinguished services. But really in this case the arrangement had been made entirely by Lord Raglan before his departure, and the Government had very justly considered that Lord Raglan was the proper person to decide who should fill the office of Lieutenant General of the Ordnance during his absence. Lord Raglan was the last person in the world to do an act of injustice to any man, least of all to Sir John Burgoyne; and he was sure, therefore, that the Committee would feel that the Crown had done nothing improper in the exercise of its prerogative.

MR. MACARTNEY said, that those who had been acquainted with Sir John Burgoyne in Ireland deeply felt the slur which had been cast upon him, and he regretted to find that it had been the act of Lord Raglan.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said he was certain that his hon. Friend Mr. Monsell had not intended to throw upon Lord Raglan the responsibility of this appointment, which was the act of the Government. His hon. Friend had referred to Lord Raglan, not as the person who was entitled to make the appointment, but as the person to whom the Government would look for advice, and the appointment was not the act of Lord Raglan, but of the Government, who were solely responsible for it. He would venture, with great respect, to intimate that he doubted whether much advantage arose from desultory discussions of this nature relating to an appointment of such importance. This was an act which had been done by the Crown in the exercise of its prerogative in reference to an office of very high class; the feelings of the persons who were the subjects of discussion were deeply interested in any matter of this kind; and, although he had not the slightest doubt of the friendly feelings towards Sir John Burgoyne with which the hon. Gentleman who last spoke had addressed the Committee, he much questioned whether observations of the kind the hon. Gentleman had made tended to improve the position of Sir John Burgoyne in the face of his countrymen. This act had been done in conformity with the wishes and advice of Lord Raglan, and as Lord Raglan was at a distance from the country, engaged in the discharge of most arduous duties, it was well for them to be cautious with respect to what fell from them on the subject in desultory discussion. If the prerogative of the Crown had been misused, the misuse was of so serious a nature that it ought to be made the subject of a distinct Motion, and of a formal, not of an accidental, discussion; but the prerogative had been used after a full consideration of all the circumstances of the case, and of the peculiar aptitude of Sir John Burgoyne for the most important office which he at present held. The Government would have been guilty alike of blindness and of ingratitude if they had come to any resolution, except under a sense of the distinguished merits of the excellent officer who had been spoken of by the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Captain Vernon) in terms which his great merits fully justified.

CAPTAIN LAFFAN said, he trusted that the Committee would not think him presumptuous if he ventured to say a few words upon this subject, notwithstanding what had just fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. When the appointment of the present Lieutenant General of the Ordnance was first announced, very great surprise was felt, not only among the officers of the Royal Engineers, but throughout military circles generally, that so distinguished an officer as Sir John Burgoyne should have been placed under the orders of one junior to him. Upon that occasion he (Captain Laffan) had placed a notice upon the paper of the House announcing his intention to ask for an explanation, for he felt that, without an explanation, the appointment of an officer junior to Sir John Burgoyne to command the Ordnance corps in the absence of Lord Raglan would appear to be a slur upon Sir John Burgoyne's reputation, whereas it was most probable that the Government had in no way intended any such slight, but had acted upon reasons which, if they could be made public without inconvenience to the service, might redound to the credit both of the Government and of the gallant officer who had suffered this apparent slight. Influenced by these feelings, he had sought an interview with the noble Duke the War Minister, and laid before his Grace the reasons which induced him to seek for an explanation of the appointment, and expressed a hope that his Grace might be willing and might be able, without detriment to the public service, to cause such explanations to be given as would relieve the minds of the officers of a numerous and distinguished corps from the painful impression which would otherwise prevail that they had been slighted and injured by the injustice done to their chief. His Grace was pleased to say that the explanation was easy—that the apparent slight put upon Sir John Burgoyne was really, when rightly understood, the highest compliment the Government could pay him, and that the arrangement had been made in this way—that at first it had been intended that Sir John Burgoyne should have gone out as second in command of the army in Turkey, and that it was only on Sir John Burgoyne's return from his tour of inspection of the countries which were about to become the theatre of war that the Government had altered their intention; and his Grace was pleased to add that he was not unwilling himself to take all the responsibility of having detained Sir John Burgoyne in England; for that Sir John Burgoyne from his great experience, his intimate acquaintance with the Ordnance service, and the local knowledge of the East which he had just gained, was a person to whom the Government could at all times look with confidence to advise them in any contingencies which might arise. His Grace added that, while it had become necessary to detain Sir John Burgoyne for the present in England, it was still inexpedient to place him at the head of the Ordnance service, as the Ordnance Department would be called upon to render great services during the war, and it was desirable, therefore, that the direction of that department should be disturbed as little and as seldom as possible; that the Government could not, therefore, place it in the hands of Sir John Burgoyne, whose services they wished to have free and immediately available whenever a necessity might arise, for no one could foretell the future, and England might have to exert her strength upon other shores and to send out other expeditions, and the Government deemed it expedient to keep Sir John Burgoyne ever in readiness to take command of an expeditionary force. He had felt the explanations which his Grace had been pleased to give to be at once so satisfactory to the corps of which Sir John Burgoyne was the greatest ornament, and so complimentary to that gallant officer, that he expressed a hope that his Grace would cause a similar explanation to be given in that House, and he understood from his Grace that if he gave notice to the noble Lord the leader of the House of his intention to ask the question, his Grace would arrange that a reply similar in purport should be given. Had that been done, it was most probable that the desultory discussion of which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had complained would never have taken place; but, instead of giving an explanation similar to that given by the Minister of War, the noble Lord the leader of that House, in the exercise of that discretion which his position and his great experience fully entitled him to use, had confined himself to saying that the appointment of the present Lieutenant General of the Ordnance had been made with the concurrence of Lord Raglan and of Lord Hardinge, and that, of course, the Government could not be expected to give any further explanation of it. He could only express his regret that upon that occasion the noble Lord the leader of the House had not deemed it expedient to give a more full explanation.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that no one who knew anything of Sir Hew Ross and Sir John Burgoyne but must regard them personally, and entertain the highest regard for their distinguished services. But anything affecting Sir John Burgoyne was strongly felt in Ireland, where it was not forgotten how much he had done during the famine, and whose conduct on that occasion had caused him to be regarded with affection in that country. The whole of the explanation which had been given amounted to this, that Sir John Burgoyne was so useful in his present position that he was a sufferer by it. He wished to ask the hon. Clerk of the Ordnance (Mr. Monsell) how it was intended to dispose of the additional men proposed for the Artillery—were they to be added to each company? He perceived an estimate for a sum to Mr. Whitworth for improvements in gun-barrels, and he wished to urge the necessity of liberality in paying persons who made experiments in improvements of small arms, which he thought should be encouraged as much as possible.

MR. MONSELL said, that it was intended to add ten men to each company of the Artillery. With regard to the improvement of small arms, he thought no great fault could be found with his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the score of want of liberality, for he had refused him (Mr. Monsell) nothing that he asked since he had been connected with the Ordnance, and large sums had been spent in remunerating persons for successful experiments. It would not, however, do to advance money for the purpose of making experiments. All that the Government could do was to reward those making them when they were successful.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he hoped that the Committee would bear in mind that the case of Sir John Burgoyne ought not to be considered as if it happened when all the military departments were in a fixed state. At that time the change in the department of the War Minister was going on, and there might have been such a rearrangement of departmental offices as might have made it a very left-handed compliment to Sir John Burgoyne to have placed him in a position from which he might in consequence of other changes have been soon removed.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he did not say that the Crown could not appoint junior officers to commands over the heads of seniors, and, indeed, the Committee of that House had recommended that appointments should be made according to merit and capability. He did not question the prerogative of the Crown in this respect, nor did Sir John Burgoyne.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he hoped the Ordnance Department would lose no time in pressing forward the supply of arms from the manufactories of the country.

BRIBERY, &c., BILL—RESOLUTION.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE: My Lords, in moving the Resolution which shall enable your Lordships to give a second reading to the Bribery Bill, notwithstanding the Resolution passed by this House on the 2nd of May last, I am not aware that I can add much to the observations which I made to your Lordships on a former occasion, when the Bill was read a first time. When the discussion arose on Monday last as to whether there were any circumstances that would give this Bill a right to proceed, notwithstanding the Resolution to which I have referred, I stated that the main reason on which I grounded my appeal to your Lordships to read this Bill a second time was, that the writs for five boroughs had been suspended by the other House of Parliament, and that the issue of them mainly depended upon legislation on this question taking place. Before, however, touching upon that question, I must observe, that I think the Resolution to which we came in May last was misconstrued by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby), when this question was last discussed. The noble Earl said that it was impossible to represent this measure as one of recent urgency, inasmuch as the circumstances on which it was founded had existed throughout the whole Session. Now, undoubtedly, if the word "recent," in the Resolution, applied to the word "urgency," I should agree with him; but I must say that I think that the House will be satisfied that the Resolution, either grammatically or intentionally, does not bear that construction. I am sure the noble Lord who drew the Resolution will bear me out in saying that this was not the intention of the Legislature, for I recollect that when he first gave notice of his intention to move the Resolution, I had a discussion with him in private, not only as to the object, but also as to the principle and the probable result of passing a Resolution of this kind; and I certainly understood him—otherwise neither I nor the Government would have been a party to it—that the word "urgency" was left free from being coupled in construction with the words that precede it. Besides that, I apprehend that, grammatically, the Resolution does not bear any such interpretation. The words of the Resolution except Bills from its operation when the circumstances which render legislation on the subject-matter expedient "are either of such recent occurrence or urgency as to render the immediate consideration of the said Bill necessary." It is, therefore, clear that the Resolution contemplates two cases—one, when the circumstances which render legislation necessary are of recent occurrence; and the other, when the measure is of urgency in itself. Now, I apprehend that the proceedings connected with the suspension of the writs in question are sufficiently well known to render it unnecessary for me to do more than re-state to the House the arguments which I advanced on Monday last; but I may add, that I did not quite accurately set out the grounds of the origin and intention of the other House of Parliament with respect to their Resolution referring to these writs. Early in the present Session a Bill was introduced by the Attorney General for the disfranchisement of such voters in the boroughs of Cambridge, Canterbury, Hull, Maldon, and Barnstaple, as had been proved before the Royal Commissioners appointed to inquire into those boroughs to have been guilty of bribery. After considerable discussion in the House of Commons these Bills were withdrawn, and upon their withdrawal a Resolution was passed—I believe without observation, at all events without a dissentient voice—that no writ for any of those five boroughs should be moved without seven days' notice having been previously given; it being distinctly understood by the House that the object of that Resolution was to give them time to consider any question that might be raised with respect to the issuing of the writ, pending the passing of this Bill, which was then before a Select Committee of that House, and which it was hoped would for the future put an end to the systematic bribery that had prevailed. That such is the view which the House of Commons took of the matter is an admitted fact, which no one will contravene; but I may mention in corroboration of the statement I have made, that Sir Wm. Jolliffe having given notice that he would, on Monday last, move the issue of a new writ for one of the boroughs, he was asked in the House of Commons whether it was his intention then to move the writ in pursuance of the notice. He replied in the negative, stating that he should postpone his Motion to a future day, in order to see what would be the fate of the measure for the suppression of bribery. I think that this occurrence, which took place only on Monday last, is conclusive with respect to the object which the House of Commons had in view when they passed the Resolution for suspending these writs. It was remarked on Monday last, by one of your Lordships, that the length of time consumed by the House of Commons in the discussion of this Bill, was in itself conclusive against your Lordships passing it in such haste as must necessarily be the case if it is passed before the close of the Session. I think, however, that there is not much validity in an argument of this kind with reference to any Bill, and especially with reference to a Bill that so peculiarly affects the constitution, and privileges, and character, of Members of the House of Commons. But I have often heard the very converse of this proposition made use of in this House as an argument against pressing Bills at the end of the Session. It has been said that Bills have been brought into the House of Commons at so late a period of the Session, and that so little discussion upon them has taken place, that it is quite impossible they can have been properly considered by that House, and that it is therefore wrong to press them on the consideration of this House. And if your Lordships are to be influenced by considerations of this kind, I think that this is a much better reason for postponing a Bill than that which was put forth on Monday last. We have not always been so unwilling to undertake the consideration of Bills of great importance, and to pass them through this House with great rapidity, and that, too, not under any pressure on account of the lateness of the Session, but even for the convenience of individual Members of this House. I will only state, as a simple matter of fact, that the second reading of the Oxford University Bill—one of great importance, no doubt—was taken in one day, and that, too, an early one after it had been brought up from the House of Commons, and that on the following day—a most unusual course—we went into Committee upon it, in order to suit the convenience of the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby). These are matters of courtesy due from one side of the House to the other; and provided the public interests do not suffer, they may well be admitted. I merely mention the circumstance, to convince your Lordships that if for such a reason the Oxford University Bill was hurried through two important stages in this House, no complaint should be made at the Government now asking you to consider the Bribery Bill. I must say that I do think there is little reason for complaining that the same measures should now be taken with respect to a Bill that comes from the House of Commons, after being carefully considered not only in the ordinary form of a Committee of the whole House, but also by a Select Committee composed of many of the most competent Members of that assembly. It is really worth while to mention the Members who composed that Committee, in order to show that this is not such a crude and ill-digested scheme as it is represented out of this House, as well as in it. The Chairman of the Committee was Mr. Walpole, the Secretary for the Home Department under the administration of the noble Earl opposite; and amongst the other Members of the Committee were Lord John Russell, Sir Fitzroy Kelly, the late Solicitor General, the present Attorney General, Mr. Bright, Mr. Vernon Smith, Mr. Phinn, and Mr. Ball. These names are, I think, sufficient to show that the Committee was fairly formed from both sides of the House, and that it was competent to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion on this difficult and long-mooted question. It is no doubt true that an unusual circumstance, which all must admit to be inconvenient, took place in the House of Commons. Some very important alterations were made in it after the third reading; and these, no doubt—though on examination of the Bill they do not seem to affect its principle to the full extent which I apprehended when it first came from the House of Commons, have in one respect materially changed its character: it must, however, be remarked that this change is in the direction of diminishing some of its most stringent provisions. In order, therefore, to meet the difficulty which your Lordships feel with respect to passing this Bill, I shall, if your Lordships agree to the second reading, and we go into Committee upon it, propose to make it a temporary measure, and to limit its operation to two years; in order that, if any alterations which have not been sufficiently considered have crept into it, there may not only be time for their reconsideration, but that in fact their reconsideration may be forced upon Parliament. I think that making a measure of this kind temporary has on former occasions been attended with great convenience and practical benefit, and quite independently of the lateness of the Session I should have been prepared to recommend such a course. When Sir Robert Peel introduced an important alteration into the Grenville Act, the Bill which he proposed for that purpose received very careful consideration; but two or three years afterwards it was again brought before the House, and was passed in its present permanent shape, with such alterations and amendments as experience had shown to be requisite. If, then, your Lordships consent to this Amendment, and pass this Bill for two years only, every danger will be obviated, and you will at the same time accomplish that most desirable object of providing by the best means in your power against the recurrence of that systematic bribery which has heretofore prevailed in the five boroughs to which I have referred. When I said that it was quite clear that the suspension of these writs had reference to this measure, I should have added that the Bill contained within itself conclusive proof on that head; for by the 15th clause, constituting a new officer in the election auditor, your Lordships will find that those five boroughs are specifically referred to, the appointment of the election officer being made requisite at an earlier period than elsewhere in these five boroughs, in order that the Bill may be brought into operation there when the suspended writs shall be issued. Although this Bill is no doubt in many respects of great importance, its provisions are by no means of a complex character. It is not like the Bills affecting the tenure of land in Ireland which were before the House at the latter end of last Session. Undoubtedly the character of those Bills was such that considerable time must be occupied in Committee if any bonâ fide opposition should be raised to their details. That, however, is not the case with this Bill. Its provisions, though of great importance, are few in number, and there is not a Member of your Lordships' House who will pretend to say that if this Bill had come before them in the middle of the Session, and when the attendance of Peers was usually greatest, the Committee upon it would have been at all likely to last more than one night. Under these circumstances, there is no pretence for saying that there is no time to investigate the details of this Bill. And when your Lordships recollect the complaints which exist within the walls of Parliament, and still more without them, as to the prevalence of bribery, which is believed to have extended of late years, I do not think that you are likely to refuse a second reading to this Bill, and to throw legislation over to another year; in the first place, because such a course would be very likely to be misrepresented in the country and in the other House; and, in the second place, which I know will be a stronger inducement to your Lordships, because you would be putting off for a year, if not for a longer period, a legislative measure which those who have had most practical experience in these matters believe to be most likely to check a system which has become so great a stain and disgrace upon the character of the constituency of this country. Even, indeed, if bribery has not extended as much as the public believe, it has from circumstances become much more patent to the world; and, therefore, as regards its moral effects on the country, much more prejudicial. I have no doubt that recent legislation has tended to bring before the public many practices which passed unobserved in past years. I believe that the amendment of the Grenville Act, which was passed by the late Sir Robert Peel, and to which I have already referred, was the first step to bring these cases of corruption more tangibly and obviously before the public eye; and I am confident that the measure which, at the instigation of Lord John Russell, was passed three or four years ago, and by which inquiry, by Royal Commission, was authorised to be made into the existence of corrupt practices in boroughs, under certain circumstances, had tended still more to bring these cases under the notice of the public. But if you say that there has been, in reality, no extension of corruption, but that we merely hear of it more now than formerly because the Legislature has made it more patent, I contend that the only conclusion deducible from that argument is, that the Legislature having heretofore brought these crimes and offences to light, it becomes now more imperative upon Parliament to deal with them, and to endeavour to check them by the best means in our power.

I will now draw your Lordships' attention to the principal enactments in this Bill, and to the chief alterations that have been introduced into it in its passage through the other House. One of the most important features in this Bill is certainly one that should recommend it to your Lordships' favour. I have often heard it stated in this House that Bills entailing heavy penalties required the most careful consideration, and I think that is a valid argument. But, so far from increasing penalties, this Bill diminishes those which exist in every instance. The legislation affecting bribery has heretofore failed in a great measure, as I believe, from the excessive weight of the penalties inflicted. They have been, especially as regards the poor voters, of so onerous a description, that there has been a feeling adverse to putting them in force; and I believe that the measures against bribery have failed as much from this cause as from any other. This measure, however, proceeds on a different plan; and, instead of inflicting heavy penalties either on the person offering a bribe, or on the person accepting it, it proceeds on what I believe to be a much sounder principle of legislation, and one much better adapted to human nature, and rather endeavours to render unattainable the objects sought by the briber and the bribed, than to punish those who engage in either the one crime or the other. Another provision in this Bill, and one which strongly recommends it to those who have sat on Election Committees, provides not merely for erasing from the list of voters the principals who have been found guilty of bribery, but for placing them on the registry of voters on a separate list, so that they shall be held up to the public remark and the observation of their neighbours. There has been, as cannot be unknown to your Lordships, great difficulty in dealing with this offence by Committees of the House of Commons, in consequence of its undefined character. In this Bill, therefore, an attempt has been made with great care, and a very considerable application of legal knowledge, to define the offence which it seeks to punish and prevent. As regards bribery, it commences by repealing—wholly in some cases, and to a large extent in others—the various Acts which have been heretofore passed with regard to bribery and corrupt practices; and the body of the Bill then contains a definition of what should be deemed bribery in future. The same course is taken with respect both to the offences of “treating” and “undue influence.” Undoubtedly no part of this question is so difficult to deal with as the exercise of “undue influence.” An attempt is, however, made to define it here; and if that definition be not perfect, it, at any rate, brings within its scope many of those forms of the offence which have heretofore passed scathless, but which successive Parliaments have sought in vain to inclose within the meshes of their legislation. I now come to a provision of great importance—indeed, now that the declaration has been struck out of the Bill, the leading provision—that which relates to the appointment of the election auditor. That provision was introduced at the suggestion of Sir F. Kelly, the Solicitor General of the Government of the noble Earl opposite. The Select Committee to whom the Bill was referred took great care to invest him with such duties and powers as might enable him to attain the object for which alone he was appointed. The great object of appointing this officer is to ensure publicity, by requiring every candidate to send the bills of his election expenses to this officer. These bills will then be made accessible to the opposing candidates and their agents, and to the public generally, by the publication of them, which the election officer is authorised to make, in the newspapers. The commission of bribery, if any has taken place, will thus be made so obvious, as to render it probable that those who contemplate it will shrink from the exposure which will most likely follow its commission. In this Bill, the two very difficult questions of the payment of the travelling expenses of voters, and of their refreshments, are dealt with. All Members of your Lordships’ House who have been formerly Members of the other House, and have sat upon Election Committees, must be aware that these questions have been two of the greatest stumbling-blocks to Election Committees. One Committee has given a decision that the payment of one was legal and the other illegal, or vice versa, according to the individual views of the Members of the Committee who sat upon each case. The present Bill, however, provides that in future the payment of travelling expenses shall be legal, and that all payments for refreshments shall be illegal. I readily admit that questions may arise as to the propriety of these provisions. Some may say that while the travelling expenses ought to be paid, the charges for refreshment should not be allowed, and others may hold the contrary opinion; but, one way or the other, your Lordships will agree with me in thinking that it is most desirable that a decision should be come to, and that these conflicting views, which have hitherto led to the greatest possible embarrassment, should be put an end to, by deciding the legality or illegality one way or the other. I have already referred to a provision of this Bill which was introduced in Committee in the House of Commons, but struck out after the third reading, by which a declaration was provided to be taken by Members elected to the House of Commons declaring their freedom from all acts of bribery. It is unnecessary now, as this declaration is no longer in the Bill, to express any opinion as to the wisdom or danger of such a provision; I will, therefore, only say that there are two clauses in the Bill, the 33rd and 34th, which provide for a declaration not to be taken by Members of Parliament, but by candidates previously, which ought to follow the removal of the other clause, or which ought to be greatly altered or entirely omitted. I appeal to your Lordships not to refuse your consideration to this measure, and not to refuse to pass this Resolution, by which you will preclude all discussion, and shut the door peremptorily against the second reading. It by no means follows, if you agree to this Resolution, that you should subsequently pass the second reading, if on listening to the arguments, and hearing all that can be said for and against its provisions, you are satisfied that it is not such a measure as would meet the objects we all wish to attain. But what I wish is that, when a measure of this kind is brought from the other House of Parliament, you will not at once say you will not entertain it. When the writs for five boroughs are suspended, with a view to the passing of this measure, how can it be said that it is not one of urgency? I ask your Lordships to give to this measure that latitude which is extended by the Resolution of the 2nd of May to Bills of this description, and that you will consent to entertain the Motion for the second reading of this Bill. The noble Duke moved to resolve—

“That the Suspension of the Writs for five Boroughs by Order of the House of Commons, until new legislative Precautions shall have been taken to prevent the Recurrence of the System of Bribery which was proved by Royal Commissioners to have prevailed in those Boroughs, is (within the Meaning of the Resolution of this House of the 2nd May last) a Circumstance of such Urgency as to render necessary the immediate Consideration of a Bill brought from the House of Commons on the 31st of July, intituled, ‘An Act to consolidate and amend the Laws relating to Bribery, Treating, and undue Influence at Elections of Members of Parliament;’ and that accordingly it is reasonable that the said Bill be allowed to be read a Second Time this Day, if the House shall think fit so to order.”

LORD REDESDALE said, that in rising to oppose the adoption of the Resolution which had been proposed by the noble Duke, their Lordships were not to expect that he would go into the question of the Bill itself. On the contrary, he thought it was desirable that the whole of the discussion should turn upon the question of their Lordships’ Resolution of the 2nd of May, because the merits of the Bill had nothing to do with the question. The discussion was, whether this could be fitly considered a Bill of that urgency that it should come within the spirit of the exceptions of the Resolution passed by their Lordships on the 2nd of May; and whether their Lordships were, therefore, prepared to set aside that Resolution. He believed it was perfectly plain and expedient that the Resolution of the 2nd of May should be supported, because it must be evident not only to those who had considered the matter in that House, but also to those who had considered it out of the House, that it was necessary that a limitation should be put to the time when measures brought up from the other House should be taken into discussion. If that be the case, he trusted they would consider the question dispassionately and not with party views, for it was not a party question; he trusted they would support that principle which, if once adopted in a case like the present, would conduce more to improve the legislation of both Houses of Parliament than any other measure that could be adopted. He asked their Lordships not to

by the noble Duke, first, because the Resolution itself was an improper Resolution for their Lordships to adopt; and secondly, because it was a proposition to set aside the Resolution of the 2nd of May without sufficient reasons for so doing. He did not mean the slightest disrespect to the noble Duke when he said the Resolution was of a character that should not, under any circumstances, be adopted by the House. It stated that which was not borne out by the fact; and which, therefore, would put that House in an improper position as regarded the other House of Parliament; and on that ground alone the Resolution was one that should not be adopted. The noble Duke’s Resolution stated that “the suspension of the writs for five boroughs was ordered by the House of Commons until new legislative precautions should have been taken to prevent the recurrence of the system of bribery.” Now, the House of Commons had never said anything that would in any way justify their Lordships in resolving that the House of Commons had declared that the suspension of those writs was to continue until there was new legislation. The only Resolution the House of Commons had come to with respect to these writs was, that no Motion should be made for the issuing of those writs except on seven days’ notice. When that Resolution was proposed, an Amendment was moved that no new writ should be issued until the 30th of December, and it was afterwards moved that no new writs should be issued until the 30th of June, which latter would have had the effect of postponing the issue of the writs for one month; but both those Amendments were rejected, and the Resolution with regard to the seven days’ notice was passed. [See APPENDIX.] Whether the House of Commons was right in suspending the writs was a great constitutional question, into which he would not now enter; but he would say that instead of acting as they were represented to have acted by the Resolution, the House of Commons merely came to what, under the proceeding they had themselves adopted, was a proper Resolution, namely, that in order that no hurry and surprise should take place with regard to moving for writs, seven days’ notice of such Motion should be given. He would assert boldly—and he thought no one could controvert the assertion—that it would be unparliamentary, and contrary to a good understanding between the two Houses of Parliament, if either House should resolve that any determination of the other had been come to upon grounds which were not specifically stated by that other. Yet that was what the present Resolution did, and it would be offensive to the other House if their Lordships were to say that that House had done so. But, suppose the House of Commons had come to such a Resolution as was stated in the Motion before their Lordships—that they would suspend the issue of the writs until legislation should have taken place—the moving of that Resolution as a ground for their Lordships' proceedings would be an improper manner of addressing their Lordships' House on the subject, and on that ground alone he would appeal to their Lordships to resist it; for how could it be considered but as an unfair pressure on their Lordships, if the House of Commons had said they would not do a particular act, except their Lordships should pass a certain measure on the subject. It was not fitting that this Resolution should be put upon the minutes of their Lordships' House, first, because the House of Commons had not done that which it was stated they had done; and next, if they had done it, they would have put an improper pressure upon their Lordships as a reason for a legislative proceeding in that House. Having made this preliminary objection, he would now ask their Lordships to consider whether this Bill could be fairly brought within the meaning of the "urgency" contemplated by their Lordships' Resolution. The noble Duke had said that it was never intended by the noble Baron who proposed the Resolution that the word "recent" should govern "urgency;" and that it could not grammatically do so; but he (Lord Redesdale) certainly intended that it should govern both "urgency," and "occurrence." The question they had to consider was, whether this Bill could be fairly considered to come within the Resolution of the 2nd of May. The question of bribery was one that had been treated over and over again by Parliament, and could not be considered as a question—though important in itself—of "urgency." A delay for another year, before a new Bill on the question of bribery was made the law of the land, was one that could not be considered to constitute a case of "urgency." They had passed the Resolution in order that their Lordships should have time for the discussion of important Bills, and the consequence of passing it was, that a number of Peers had made up their minds to leave town. And what they were now asked to do was, that a Bill which had been brought into their Lordships' House on Monday should be read a second time on Thursday, when the fact of the Bill having been introduced could not have been known to a number of Peers who had left town. Therefore, unless the case of urgency was made most clear, they would be setting aside the whole effect of their Resolution if they allowed this Bill to be pressed forward. The effect of rescinding this Resolution would be, that any party who could at the close of the Session command a majority in the House would be able to declare whether they considered a question to be of urgency or not. He, therefore, asked their Lordships not to agree to the Resolution of the noble Duke, and urged upon them to recollect what the effect would be of their introducing important Amendments into the Bill, and what consideration could be given to them by the other House of Parliament. He did not think it would be proper that they should send back to the other House a Bill affecting it, with Amendments, at a period of the Session when there would be unquestionably the smallest possible attendance of Members. For these reasons, and being convinced that their Lordships would by refusing to agree to this Motion, do much to give effect to the principle of the Resolution of the 2nd of May, he must say non-content to the Motion of the noble Duke.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN: My Lords, my noble Friend has not referred to the provisions of the Bill before the House, and it is not my intention to do so; but I wish to make a few observations upon the Resolution to which my noble Friend thinks it indispensable that we should adhere on this occasion. Now, I think your Lordships would do well in the present case to relax your adherence to that Resolution—which I admit has produced salutary effects, and which will still produce salutary effects if you treat it as it deserves. The Resolution itself involves no question of principle; it was adopted for the mutual convenience of Members of this House—of both Houses of Parliament, I may say—and so it must be considered and treated. Every effort has been made, in this House and elsewhere also, to effect the object aimed at by this Resolution. Only the other day, a very important Bill which was announced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, was dropped by him in consequence of the existence of this Resolution—I mean a Bill for the abolition of the usury laws. It has since been introduced in this House by a noble Friend of mine, and has been originated in this House in consequence of the existence of that Resolution, notwithstanding the Chancellor of the Exchequer had given notice of the Bill. Therefore every means has been taken to carry into effect the spirit of the Resolution as it was understood when proposed. But your Lordships should be cautious how you apply too stringently the provision which the noble Baron desires to interpret as belonging to this Resolution. Rely upon it that if you proceed in a manner so arbitrary and so completely without qualification, it is impossible to expect that the other House of Parliament will consent to act under the compulsion of a Resolution of the House of Lords, and it may lead to serious differences between the two Houses of Parliament. I am happy to say that hitherto there have not been any very serious differences between the two Houses of Parliament; indeed, nothing is more wonderful, nothing is more astonishing, than the continuing harmony of the two Houses of Parliament in the conduct of the legislation of the country. It seems hardly possible that between two bodies, each possessing such powers as the two Houses of Parliament do, so little difference, so little of contestation, should arise—and this is only owing to mutual forbearance, and to the deference of each House one to the other. If ever serious difference should arise between them, it will be an event not only deeply to be deplored, but which cannot but lead to the serious injury of the Parliamentary constitution of the country. I say that if this Resolution were to be enforced in the arbitrary manner proposed by my noble Friend, it would be an outrage upon the privileges of the House of Commons; for to tell them that they shall not send up a measure after a certain day is not far short of an insult to that House. As a means for the reasonable expedition of measures brought before you, they have acquiesced, and no doubt will acquiesce hereafter, in the Resolution, and expedite business, as we shall equally do, with the view of meeting the spirit and object for which the Resolution was affirmed; but anything further than this would be at variance with the privileges of the House of Commons—with what has been their practice, and probably will be still their practice, if you give to this Resolution that fair and liberal interpretation according to which only it can exist, and according to which I believed it would be considered, or I would never have agreed to it. I wish to avoid the possibility of leading to a serious difference between the two Houses, and I wish also to avoid the exercise of an arbitrary and unreasonable assumption of authority on the part of this House. I deny altogether the constitutional character of the reasons assigned by the noble Lord—of the Session being too far advanced, and the probability of there being too thin an attendance of Peers. Wishing to avoid these difficulties, I think your Lordships ought to agree to the Motion of the noble Duke. If there be too thin an attendance in your Lordships' House, it is no reason whatever for refusing to agree to the Motion. It is a reason, no doubt, to influence the convenience of your Lordships, but not to limit or abrogate the discretion of the House of Commons in the transaction of the business before them. I therefore entreat of your Lordships not to look upon this as an arbitrary Resolution which you have laid down, and to which you will adhere—not as a case of sic volo, sic jubeo. No one will deny that this is a measure which would justify your Lordships in taking it at least into consideration; for, as my noble Friend near me has said, you may if you think proper on full consideration reject the second reading of the Bill. That is perfectly intelligible and within your competence; but to interpret this Resolution as an arbitrary rule in the manner proposed by my noble Friend opposite, is a thing likely to lead to most serious and mischievous consequences.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, the noble Earl had altogether and very prudently abstained from taking the slightest notice of any of the observations that had been made by his noble Friend who opposed this Resolution. Not one word had fallen from the noble Earl in refutation of the statement that was made by my noble Friend, that this Resolution was one which it was impossible for their Lordships, with propriety, to accede to. It attributed to the House of Commons that it had passed a Resolution which it had not passed, and it attributed to them motives by which they were not influenced. If their Lordships had passed such a Resolution they would have failed in the courtesy which they should always wish to see reciprocated between the two Houses of Parliament, and yet it was proposed to make such a Resolution the basis for legislation in their Lordships' House, though by recognising such a Resolution they would in fact compromise the independence of their own legislative powers. It was not right to say by this Resolution that writs had been suspended until their Lordships should have legislated upon the subject, for that was not what the House of Commons had done. What they had done, and what was very natural for them to do, was, that, while this Bill was pending, and it was uncertain under what system of law the elections would take place if the writs were issued, they suspended the writs until they should see if Parliament were about to legislate upon the subject; but for the House of Commons to say that they would indefinitely postpone the issue of the writs for those five boroughs until the House of Lords should assent to a measure they had sent up to them, would be to adopt a principle so unconstitutional that neither this nor any other House of Commons had ever dreamed of enunciating it. Their Lordships must observe that the proposition contained in the Resolution was not that the writs should not be issued until the House of Lords had decided whether or not they should pass this measure, or whether Parliament should or should not pass this Bill, but that the writs should not be issued until fresh legislation had taken place. Their Lordships were called upon, therefore, not only to consider the Bill, but to pass it. They were in duress with regard to their legislative powers, and they were to be compelled to pass it in the form sent up from the House of Commons, or, at all events, they were not to introduce any Amendments to which the House of Commons would be indisposed to assent; for the House of Commons might not choose to agree to any Amendments which their Lordships might make in the Bill, and in that case legislation would equally fail, and the writs would be indefinitely suspended. Now, what was the real state of the case? The House of Commons had refused even to suspend the writs to the 30th of December, and, anticipating an earlier Session than this, had refused to postpone them till the 30th of June. Indeed, if he were not mistaken, at that very moment there was a Motion pending in the other House for the issue of writs to the whole of these five boroughs. It was quite true that the noble Lord holding the high office of President of the Council announced in the other House his opinion, that these writs ought not to be issued until legislation had taken place; but the experience of the Session led him to the conclusion that what one Member of the Government announced as his view was not necessarily the view of any other Member of the Government. It was quite possible that the view of the noble Lord the President of the Council might be declared by others of his colleagues to be "wholly unconstitutional," and even "sheer nonsense." Even if it so happened that the whole of the Members of the Government should, marvellously, be of one opinion—what security was there that that opinion would be in accordance with the views of the House of Commons? He must say this, that the House of Commons had never come to such a Resolution and had never affirmed such an opinion as this Resolution, which their Lordships were called upon to affirm, attributes to the House of Commons, and attributes to them in order to make it the basis of your Lordships' legislation. The noble Earl opposite had shown great prudence and discretion in abstaining from referring to these matters; but would their Lordships pass them over now that this objection had been taken? Would they, with their eyes open, declare that the House of Commons had done that which they had not done, and take as the basis of their legislation a supposed Resolution of the House of Commons, which, if the other House had passed, would be an infringement of the privileges of their Lordships? Would their Lordships so far stultify themselves as to adopt such a course? The noble Earl had abstained from entering into the merits of the Bill itself, and he should follow the example of the noble Earl; but the noble Duke (the Duke of Newcastle) had said that the Bill had in many of its details the sanction of high authorities, and that it had passed through a Select Committee. The noble Duke had reminded their Lordships what distinguished authorities had sat upon that Committee, but he had neglected to say that, when it came out of Committee, the House of Commons had not so great a respect as the noble Duke seemed to have for those high authorities, inasmuch as they had totally altered the measure, and, up to the very last moment, had made material and most important alterations in it. The noble Duke had himself intimated that he did not consider that at this period of the Session the House of Lords could fairly and properly consider and discuss the measure so as to make it as perfect as it might be made. If they were to overrule their Resolution and to pass this Bill in deference to the House of Commons it was certainly with some pleasure that he found the noble Duke prepared to make it a temporary measure, which was only to be passed for one or two years. But why should it be made a temporary measure? Manifestly because there was not time to make it as perfect a measure as it ought to be. He admitted the prudence and discretion of the noble Duke, and thought he was quite right in thinking that, if the Bill was to be taken as it was and considered at all, it should only be passed for two years, and that, having faith in the House of Commons, they should not enter upon what could be little more than a partial discussion, occurring at a late period of the Session, when but few Peers were likely to be in attendance. The noble Duke said, "Make it a temporary measure, because you have not time to make it a perfect measure." [The Duke of NEWCASTLE denied that he had made any such statement.] The only reason he could conceive for not amending the Bill, so as to make it as perfect a measure as possible, was, that they had not time naturally to consider the principles of the Bill. If that were the only proposition, he might perhaps be inclined to accede to the proposal of the noble Duke, to pass the Bill as it was, for the space of two years. But what did the noble Duke propose to do further? Taking it as a temporary measure, the noble Duke told their Lordships that there were two clauses in the Bill which he wished to expunge and to alter, and he proposed then to send the Bill, as amended, to the House of Commons. Now, the object and intention of the Resolution of their Lordships were to give to that and the other House of Parliament full time to consider measures passed at the close of the Session. If their Lordships were to waive their privileges, and assent to the passing of the Bill in violation of their own Resolution, and were to make Amendments in the measure, what would be the effect? The Bill would go down to the other House to be considered towards the last day of the Session, and it would be considered by perhaps forty or fifty Members, after having been passed by 200 or 300. He must say that this would be a most extraordinary mode of showing deference to the House of Commons; they would, in reality, be enabling the Government of the day to set aside the opinion of the House of Lords and the House of Commons, and to do what they thought fit with any measure introduced into the House, provided they delayed to introduce it till towards the close of the Session. He thought that to pay proper deference to the House of Commons they ought not at the period of the Session to amend a Bill of this nature, and send it down, as amended, to be discussed in the House of Commons in the middle of the month of August. The noble Earl at the head of the Government said the Resolution of their Lordships was one which had produced and was calculated to produce very salutary effects; but how could it produce salutary effects unless it were adhered to? It was the knowledge that it was a Resolution of the House of Lords, and one which the House of Lords would adhere to, which alone could produce the salutary effect of hastening the legislation of this and the other House of Parliament. If, however, they were not to adhere to the Resolution, and were to suffer Members of that House to leave London, and go down into the country in the full assurance that they had passed a Resolution which would secure them from the possibility of dangerous measures being agreed to in their absence, and if the Government were then to say a measure was one of urgency, and that the Resolution of their Lordships must be set aside, so far from having a salutary effect, it would be a mere trap for noble Lords in that House, and would utterly fail in the effect which was intended upon the other House of Parliament. The noble Earl had talked about the arbitrary application of this rule. Now he (the Earl of Derby) knew nothing so arbitrary as the application of this rule just as the Government thought fit. If the Resolution was to be acted upon systematically and regularly, there could be nothing arbitrary in it; but if it was to depend upon a chance majority of one or two in a House of twenty or thirty Members whether the rule was to be applied or not, then, indeed, it would become an arbitrary decision, and a decision which must produce, instead of a salutary, a most mischievous effect. The noble Earl seemed to think it most astonishing and marvellous that there should be a general concurrence of opinion and good understanding between their Lordships and the other House of Parliament, and hoped this would continue to be the case; but at the same time he thought that the most dreadful consequences would result if their Lordships were to fail to show due deference to a measure of the House of Commons which had come up with a unanimity of assent. Now, what was the unanimity of assent given by the House of Commons? The unanimity of assent given to the measure upon the third reading was this—a material provision was struck out, and after that material provision was struck out the unanimous assent of the House of Commons was given by a majority of seven in a House of 200. Could it be contended, then, after the House of Commons had devoted six months discussion to the Bill, and a majority of seven only had decided that it should pass at all, that it would show a want of deference to that House if their Lordships were to fly in the face of the recorded opinions of the other House, simply because they were humbly of opinion that a Bill which had taken the House of Commons six months to consider, which had been greatly altered upon inquiry, and which had passed at the last moment by a majority of seven only, was deemed worthy of something more like discussion and deliberation than could be given to a Bill brought up with such haste and at so late a period of the Session as this? It had been brought up with such haste that it purported upon the back of it to have been printed upon—a day not in the calendar—the 31st of June, instead of the 31st of July. On the 3rd of August they were called upon to take the principle of the Bill into consideration, and on the 4th to examine its details; they must then send it back in the second week of August to be discussed again in the House of Commons. "But," said the noble Earl opposite, "this Resolution does not involve the adoption of the second reading of the Bill. Do what you like with regard to the second reading of the Bill, throw it out if you think fit." That, the noble Earl thought, would not indicate disrespect of the opinion of the other House; but if their Lordships, without any expression of opinion, as to whether the majority of 107, or the minority of 100, were right, simply ventured to say that they would like a little more time for considering the Bill, that, according to the noble Earl, would be a great violation of deference to the other House. Now, he (the Earl of Derby) looked at the matter in just the opposite point of view from this. His chief objection to the second reading was an objection as to time, and time only, and as to the necessity of adhering to the Resolution which that House had adopted as the rule of its proceedings, he said that there was everything in favour of the second reading of a Bill relating to the privileges of the other House, which came up to them with the favourable prestige of having received the assent of that House. Although he trusted they would exercise their right of discussing its principle and examining its details, yet much weight attached to it, inasmuch as it had received the approval of the other House. The measure was one of a very complicated character—much more so than the noble Duke seemed to think—and it involved penal consequences, and many serious and delicate questions; but he did not propose now to enter into its merits or demerits. He did not pretend to be able to do so. He had not had time to consider the Bill in detail; and he confessed he had not gone through and examined all the changes and vicissitudes to which it had been exposed in its progress through the other House. But, if it were not for the Resolution of this House, and if there had been proper time, he should say let the Bill be taken up and considered deliberately, and see if it can be amended; and if it is incapable of amendment, let it by all means be applied as a remedy for what everybody admits to be a great and crying evil. But his objection was, that since their Lordships had passed this Resolution, upon the faith of which Peers had left London, upon the faith of which their Parliamentary proceedings had been founded, and upon the faith of which Bills had been introduced in that House rather than in the other House of Parliament—since they had laid down this Resolution, which was likely to be most beneficial both to that and the other House of Parliament, but which could only work efficiently by their showing their determination to adhere to it, even at the risk of some trifling inconvenience—he should certainly advise their Lordships not to waive that Resolution in the present instance. If, indeed, this were a measure of paramount urgency, by the delay of which the best interests of the country might suffer—if it were anything affecting our foreign relations or influencing the vigorous prosecution of the war in which they were now engaged—not a single word would have been said on the subject, nor would the Resolution have been pleaded in bar to it. But this was a measure to which none of these considerations would apply; it was comparatively unimportant whether it were passed in the course of this year or the next; it was the very case, in fact, upon which their adherence to the Resolution they had passed could fairly be tested, without disrespect to the other House of Parliament, and without inconvenience to the interests of the country. Deeming it to be most important that the Resolution should not be set aside without due cause and upon full consideration, and believing that the ground for so doing asserted in the noble Duke's Resolution was inconsistent with the facts, and that, even if it were consistent with them, it would be a most improper ground for their Lordships to act upon, he should certainly say No, with his noble Friend, to that Resolution.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, he should certainly give an unhesitating vote—not in favour of this Bill, for that was not the question before them—but in favour of making this an exception to the just, proper, and expedient general rule which their Lordships had adopted on the proposition of the noble Baron (Lord Redesdale). In proposing the adoption of this rule, he had never understood the noble Baron to say that it was to be adopted as an inflexible Resolution, liable to no exception; but if he had so meant it, he ought distinctly to have stated it, and if he had done that, he (the Marquess of Lansdowne) believed the Resolution would have met with a very different reception from that House, and certainly from the other House of Parliament. The noble Baron, however, in his argument in support of the Resolution, and in the express terms of the Resolution itself, admitted that he did not intend it as a rule without an exception, for he had introduced into a provision that a case of recent occurrence or urgency should be a proper exception from the rule; and with that necessary and proper qualification, the Standing Order was unanimously adopted by that House. The Resolution was, that, after a certain period of the Session—and, for convenience' sake, a certain day was named—their Lordships would proceed with no Bill except in a matter of urgency. The question at issue, therefore, was, was this Bill from its nature and subject a measure of urgency, or was it not? He maintained that it was a measure of urgency; and the argument lay in a nutshell. If the noble Baron (Lord Redesdale) had so framed the Standing Order as not only to make an exception in it in favour of a measure of urgency, but had gone further, and attempted in express words to define what was a question of urgency, and if their Lordships had agreed to the Resolution in that shape, the definition which in that case must have been adopted must have been one that would exactly have included a Bill of this description—a Bill which the other House of Parliament in the exercise of its discretion had sent up, affecting its own peculiar interests and privileges. The noble Baron would admit that the interests and privileges of the other House were concerned in the present Bill. Another criterion of urgency would have been, that the measure was intended or calculated—or, at all events, endeavoured—to put an end to an evil that was universally admitted to exist. Well, this Bill sought to mitigate, if it could not entirely remove, an evil which everybody in both branches of the Legislature and in the country admitted, and held it to be the duty of Parliament to endeavour to check. So that there were two marks of urgency visible on the face of this Bill. Not only was this Bill directed against an evil which was eating like a festering canker into the very heart of our representative system, but unless the remedy it proposed was adopted, there would ensue this important consequence—that, as the representation of a certain number of boroughs had been suspended in anticipation of some steps being taken for this purpose, those boroughs must now be left entirely unrepresented, or they must be liable to be misrepresented, for want of a corrective to the existing corruption. It was clear, therefore, that this Bill came within the category of the exceptions contemplated by the Standing Order; and he might add, that there was a danger that the universally admitted and serious evil against which it was levelled might be incurred within the next three months if they did not pass this Bill. But he went further, and if this was not a measure of urgency, he would ask the noble Baron what was a measure of urgency? Again, if the noble Baron did not intend to admit of cases of urgency, why did he not openly state it at the time the Standing Order was under discussion, and arbitrarily say that after a certain day in the calendar no Bill of whatever nature should be allowed to be considered, and that the action of the Legislature was to be chained down, for the House of Commons, although in a question affecting its own rights, and affecting the fair, honest, and true representation of the people, would not have its measures considered by their Lordships? He said, then, that this was a case of urgency; and this, he believed, would be the opinion, not of the other House only, but of the country. In regard to what had been said, that the Resolution moved by the noble Duke made an incorrect recital of the facts with regard to the proceedings in the other House, it was clear that in saying that the House of Commons had suspended the writs of five boroughs, the Resolution more fully expressed the obvious interpretation that must be placed upon that fact by any man of common sense, namely, that it was the object of the other House, as it was their duty, to endeavour to secure that the returns from those boroughs where the writs had been suspended, should be as free as the ingenuity and skill of Parliament could contrive from the corruption which the noble Earl opposite acknowledged unfortunately to exist in many boroughs. He (the Marquess of Lansdowne) knew too well that many previous Bribery Bills had been passed, and had failed; and it would be presumptuous to say that this Bill provided what so many former Parliaments and wise legislators had failed to discover—namely, an effectual and complete remedy for bribery. But that was no argument against their giving a fair consideration to a Bill which had been sent to them from the House of Commons, which, he believed, would tend to the correction of some portion, at least, of a flagrant evil. The noble Earl opposite had said that noble Lords had left town under the conviction that no “dangerous” measure would be introduced in their absence; but he (the Marquess of Lansdowne) thought it too much to say that a Bill to put down bribery and corruption was a dangerous measure. If there was anything dangerous in this Bill, let the noble Earl point it out; and he (the Marquess of Lansdowne) must say that he thought noble Lords, knowing that a Bill was likely to come up designed to suppress corruption and improve the representation of the people, would have only done their duty if they had remained at their posts to consider it, and remove any lurking evil that might be found in a measure having so important and beneficial an object as that of putting an end to the evils by which too many elections were characterised. The noble Earl had also alluded to the fact that this Bill, notwithstanding the great labour which had been bestowed upon it, had not passed the other House by a very large majority, and that it would not have been very dissatisfactory to a great number of people if it had been lost. He really thought, however, that if their Lordships waited to pass a Bribery Bill until they should have one sent up which gave general satisfaction, they would have to wait for ever. They had all seen advertisements of quack doctors, announcing that they had discovered universal specifics, which not only cured and eradicated every complaint, but were most pleasing to the palate of the patient at the same time.

Now, if their Lordships were sanguine enough to think that they would discover a panacea for bribery sufficiently stringent for its entire removal, and likewise agreeable to the taste of all candidates, past and future, he was afraid they were indulging themselves with a very pleasing hallucination; but, in the meanwhile, bribery and corruption would remain in rank and fatal luxuriance. All they were asked to do on the present occasion was to defer so far to the opinion of the House of Commons as to consider whether this Bill would not go some way towards the extirpation of a most serious evil, and whether it should not be allowed to be put in force for two years at least; seeing that the experiment might enlighten their Lordships and the other House as to the best means of coping more effectually with the scandalous abuses disgracing our representative system. Upon these grounds he trusted that their Lordships would consent, even by way of exception, to consider the present Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said that, after the clear and able speeches of the two noble Lords opposite who opposed the present Motion, he should not have troubled their Lordships with any explanations of his own, had it not been for the speech of the noble Marquess who had just sat down. The noble Marquess had commenced by stating very clearly what was the question before the House; but the rest of his speech consisted in a denunciation of the evils of bribery, and a not very just insinuation that those who did not agree in the Resolution of the noble Duke were not so alive to those evils as he was. This Bill was on the whole not a bad Bill, though far from perfect; but the question was, whether they should adopt the noble Duke’s Resolution. The noble Marquess had not attempted to show that the Resolution was really true in fact or correct in reasoning, and, for his part, he maintained that the Resolution stated what was not the fact, and was most erroneous and dangerous in reasoning. The noble Marquess said, that the House of Commons and the public thought this Bill an urgent measure. Now he (the Marquess of Clanricarde) had occasion to know that the greatest difference of opinion existed, both in and out of the House, with regard to this Bill. Many of the most eminent Reformers in the House of Commons, as well as men known for their zeal in that cause out of the House, and for their exertions to secure purity of election, thought that it would not be undesirable that the House of Commons should have an opportunity of reconsidering this measure. His objection, however, to this Resolution was, that it was an ignominious departure from the Resolution which their Lordships had deliberately arrived at. The Government seemed suddenly struck with the extreme urgency of this question; but how came it that they had not been alive to its urgency at an earlier period of the Session? The first Bill relating to this subject was brought in by Sir F. Kelly, and was printed on the 21st of February. Shortly afterwards the Government Bill was introduced—on the 24th of February, he believed—but nothing more was done with regard to either of them during the whole of the month of March, except to read them sub silentio a first time. It did not seem as though they were considered so very urgent then, for, though the Reform Bill had then been withdrawn, and several other Bills cleared out of the way, it was not until the 10th of April that these Bills were referred to a Select Committee, which, again, did not sit for the despatch of business, important business at least, until the 6th of May. The noble Duke had told them of the great value of the labours of that Committee; but, as the noble Earl opposite had observed, he did not state what was the opinion of the House of Commons on that point. In the proceedings of the Select Committee he found that they had divided no less than nine times on important questions; and so little weight was after all attached to the decision of the Select Committee, that seven days had been spent in the Committee of the whole House, and no less than twenty-eight divisions had taken place on the most important parts of the Bill; and in general the majorities had been very narrow indeed. On these divisions Gentlemen of the most opposite political opinions voted side by side—a fact which showed that they were not the result of any factious opposition to the Bill, but that the difficulties of the subject had led to its receiving the greatest care and deliberation; and when it was pretended that the House of Commons would be angry at their not suspending their rule to make way for this Bill, it should be borne in mind that it had only been finally carried through that House by a bare majority of seven. The subject was so complicated and difficult, that men who usually agreed together differed on its most important parts, and therefore the Bill required the greatest consideration and deliberation. Therefore, if ever there was a Bill to which the Standing Order moved by the noble Baron (Lord Redesdale) was applicable, it was the present. It was a measure exactly like the Irish Lands Bill, which had been postponed last year for a similar reason, and like many other Bills which both Houses from time to time postponed on account of the lateness of the Session. It was said, in this case, that there were five writs suspended. Well, that was no new discovery. Why was not this argument used when Sudbury was disfranchised? It was no argument to say that Parliament could not proceed to business until the vacant seats had been filled up; because Parliament had this Session dealt with most important questions—affecting peace and war—and all the while the seats continued vacant. Why, then, could they not wait for another Session, until this subject could receive proper consideration? This was, therefore, no question of urgency, and to depart now from their rule would derogate from the character, the dignity, and the reputation of that House. The noble Marquess asked, what was a question of urgency? He could tell him that the Bill for the continuance of the Board of Health, introduced the other evening, was one, as, without that Bill, the functions of an important department of the State would have lapsed; and therefore it was right that the rule of the House should be suspended in favour of such a measure. But to suspend it for a Bill of this kind, which had occupied the attention of Parliament for several years, and which required the greatest care and sifting, would be quite absurd. The mode in which that House had secured the respect and estimation of the public was by acting with dignity, consistency, and character; but if they were to pass deliberate Resolutions and then lightly set them aside, either from caprice or at the beck of a Minister, their authority must be seriously weakened and impaired.

LORD BROUGHAM said, that if the noble Marquess who had last spoken had thought right to preface his remarks by saying, that after the speeches of other noble Lords on the same side of the question he would not have risen but for the speech of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne) who preceded him, how much more necessary was an apology due from him (Lord Brougham) for presuming to follow noble Lords who had supported this Motion, especially after that most convincing, most unanswerable—and (with all respect for his noble Friend who had just sat down) unanswered, and only unanswered because it was unanswerable—speech of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne). He must appeal to the acuteness and the candour of his noble Friend who had just sat down, who, if he looked at the Resolution moved by the noble Duke, would see that there was no ground for the assertion that it stated anything that was not the fact as to the intentions of the House of Commons or as to the urgency of this Bill. There could be no doubt that the House of Commons had suspended the writs of these five boroughs until new legislative precautions had been taken against the recurrence of bribery and corruption; but it was a great mistake to suppose, as had been supposed to-night, that this Resolution affirmed that the order of the House was to suspend these writs until Parliament legislated. The very form of the words used by the noble Duke in the Resolution excluded the supposition that he intended so to represent the proceeding that had taken place in the House of Commons. The only object of the other House was that the poll should not be opened in these five boroughs, where corruption might again be practised as it had been too much practised of late—where those abominable scenes of corruption which had been reported upon by Commissions and by Committees as having been almost habitual, might again be renewed if the writs were issued for a new election—the only object of the House could be not to allow the poll to be again opened in these five places until it had had an opportunity of taking measures to prevent the repetition of such abominations. He would ask any plain thinking man this question, and would abide by the answer he would make—for what purpose, with what possible design, could the House of Commons have suspended these writs? The suspension could only be temporary. No man imputed so absurd, so ridiculous, not to say unconstitutional a design to that House as the perpetual disfranchisement of these five boroughs. The very word “suspension” showed that that could not have been the intention—because suspension inferred that something was to follow. If it had been, the other House would have acted as it had done in the case of Sudbury, and have issued a Commission before proceeding to disfranchisement. Well, as the suspension was meant only to be temporary, how long was it to last?

Until when? Could any man stretch his imagination so as to fancy that anything else could have been in the contemplation of the other House when it delayed the issuing of the writs, except this, namely, the amendment of the laws relating to bribery and corruption, so as to take some security against the future recurrence of the same abuses that had previously taken place in the exercise of the elective franchise. He, therefore, looked upon it as perfectly clear that the fact was that the House of Commons delayed issuing the writs with no possible, with no conceivable, purpose except that in the meantime, and before a new election should be had, the laws respecting bribery and corruption might be made more stringent and more effectual. If any one who had examined the provisions of the Bill should be of opinion that it could not produce any good, and should say, “I have considered the measure, and I hold it to be utterly impossible that its provisions can effect any cure or any material diminution of the evil on all sides and universally complained of,” then, undoubtedly, such a person would have a right to say, “There is no need of inquiry, there is no need of delay, there is no need of going on with the Bill at all. Let the House of Commons issue the writs, and welcome. If the evil must be submitted to, the sooner the writs are issued the better, because no one desires that five boroughs should for ever be deprived of representatives in Parliament.” But no one whom he had heard argue, either out of the House or in it, at all pretended that the case was hopeless, or that it was perfectly evident that none of the provisions of this measure could secure any diminution of the evil complained of. On the contrary, all who had addressed themselves to the subject said, “Let the House wait, and inquire, and examine it more at leisure at another time.” It would be a great evil to delay indefinitely, or to delay even to another Session, the filling up of so material a portion of the representation of the people in the other House as ten Members for five places—some of them, no doubt, of very little importance. He spoke without any disrespect to his noble Friend the noble Earl when he said that, if a borough about which he knew a great deal were never to have a writ issued to it, he should comfort himself under such a visitation; but Hull, Canterbury, and Cambridge were important places, and all these were to be practically disfranchised by the suspension of their writs. It would be said that the House of Commons might issue these writs even if their Lordships refused to take into consideration the second reading of the Bill. No doubt they could; but would it not be better, seeing the great disposition which prevailed among all parties to seek for a remedy, and to apply one upon which they were agreed—would it not be better, more courteous to the other House, more befitting their position as lawgivers upon this important matter, more useful for the public interest, and more useful for Parliament, and for the character, privileges, and dignity of Parliament, involved in the purity of Parliament and of election—would it not be infinitely better that their Lordships should help the other House to apply this remedy, and should not give up all hopes of the remedy being available until they had well tried it, and were convinced that it could work no cure? His belief was, that much of this Bill was calculated to produce a good effect. He thought that the appointment of an election auditor was a most valuable improvement. He wished he could say the same of a clause respecting what he would venture to call bribery and treating under a disguised form—that of travelling expenses and refreshments, though to a limited extent. He well knew that when a Bribery Bill was sent up to that House about half a century after the first Bribery Bill, in the reign of George II., limiting the power of paying travelling expenses to voters, it was thrown out at the instigation of Lord Mansfield, upon his statement that the authors of the Bill did not know what the existing law upon the subject was, because that law made the payment of travelling expenses bribery, and there was no occasion for an Act to make it so or to declare anything upon the subject. He (Lord Brougham) grieved to say that this Bill ran counter to that opinion, and authorised the payment of travelling expenses and the giving of refreshments. ["No!"] He was reminded that the Bill only permitted the payment of travelling expenses, but he apprehended that if a person might be brought to the poll, he might have all needful refreshments on the road; because, if not, he would not be able to benefit by the payment of his expenses, and could not be brought to the poll at all. He had also seen, with great regret, that the declaration was confined to certain persons—agents and others. He wished there had been a declaration of a more stringent nature and a more general form, and one applicable to candidates at the time of taking their seats, and which might be administered compulsorily during the election. These were amendments which might be proposed in Committee, if their Lordships read this Bill a second time; but he confessed that, however strongly he might be in favour of such amendments, he should be very slow to propose or to ask their Lordships to assent to them, for the reason hinted at by his noble Friend the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby), that it would lead to the sending down of the Bill to the other House with these alterations at a time when the persons who might reasonably be expected most usefully to take them into consideration would probably not be there. At the same time, he held that their Lordships had a perfect right to deal with this measure as with any other which came up to them, and he thought that they grievously mistook the nature of our constitution, and lamentably forgot the history of that House in regard to Bills of this kind, who thought for a moment that their Lordships ought not to exercise the fullest discretion in regard to such a measure, to enter upon its consideration with the greatest latitude, and to amend it if they thought fit. The first Bribery Bill that ever came up to that House, in the year 1729—the 2nd George II.—received very great alterations in that House; the best clause in the Bill was inserted there, and the penalty, notwithstanding the soreness of the other House in regard to money matters, was, if his recollection served him, increased from 50*l.* to 500*l.* When the Bill was sent back to the House of Commons, it was urged that the Lords had no right to interfere with an Election Bill; but Mr. Pulteney, afterwards Lord Bath, said that it was perfectly clear that it was within the province of the House to deal with the Bill, though an Election Bill, "especially because," said he, "it is a Bill touching the criminal law of the country." So in the case of this measure he (Lord Brougham) held it to be their right to deal with it exactly as they would with any other measure received from the other House; but it was quite another thing whether they should, in the exercise of a sound discretion, make alterations at this period of the year, and send back the Bill with those alterations. He inclined to think that they ought to abstain from doing so, and to postpone what he thought would be a great improvement of the Bill until another occasion, when—from what had been stated by the noble Duke, who only suggested that the Bill should be passed temporarily—they and the other House would have full time to consider these amendments. Though he considered this Bill to be, as it now stood, a great improvement of the law, he held that the only effectual means of preventing bribery would be by laying the axe to the root—inflicting an infamous punishment upon the person bribing as well as upon the person bribed. Considering who were generally the bribed and who the bribers, he had far rather visit the offence upon the briber than upon the person bribed.

Resolution agreed to.

BRIBERY, &c., BILL.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that as their Lordships had decided to proceed with the Bill, he begged to say that he concurred in what had fallen from his noble and learned Friend as to the expediency of not making any alterations in the Bill, so as not to endanger it by sending it down to the House of Commons to be considered and altered at a time when the other House would hardly be able to take such alterations into consideration. He regretted that his noble and learned Friend had seen this objection with regard to the other House, and had not also applied the same argument to the consideration of the Bill by their Lordships, and seen that it was equally objectionable that the Bill should be proceeded with by them at the present late period of the Session. He thought the best course now to be adopted would be for their Lordships to accept the Bill as sent up by the Commons, adding simply the Amendment proposed by the noble Duke, in order to make the measure temporary, and so give Parliament an opportunity of reconsidering the subject at an early period. On the part of himself and his Friends he begged to say that they should offer no further opposition to the progress of the Bill, and the noble Duke might, if he thought fit, suspend the remainder of the Standing Orders, and take the Bill through all its stages this night.

LORD BROUGHAM, in reference to what had fallen from the noble Earl, said that if the Amendments to which he had referred as desirable had been of such a nature that without their introduction this Bill could do no good, it might have been a reason why he should have opposed the further proceeding with the Bill. The Amendments were not, however, of this character. He thought that they would improve the Bill, but he was not willing to risk the measure elsewhere by pressing them, because he thought there was quite enough good in the Bill to justify their Lordships in accepting it as it was.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE gave notice of his intention to amend the clause which allowed what were called "reasonable expenses," by moving the insertion of the word "not"—and so to alter entirely the whole purport of the clause. He reminded their Lordships that this clause was carried by but a slight majority in the House of Commons, and, therefore, might fairly be considered a subject of argument. He was one of those who considered it a monstrous proposition to allow those "reasonable expenses;" for it would leave a man with a long purse, who was inclined to bribe, immense opportunities of indulging in those practices, and of defeating a poor candidate. Upon the bringing up of the report he would therefore move that those expenses shall not be allowed.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE with pleasure concurred in what had been said by the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Clanricarde), and he rejoiced that he had adopted a different course from the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby), and had stated his intention of moving an Amendment. While, on the other hand, he (the Duke of Newcastle) was not prepared to avail himself of the kind offer of his noble Friend to suspend the Standing Orders for the purpose of proceeding at once with all the stages of the Bill, he was, on the other hand, prepared to discuss with readiness any Amendments that might be proposed, and to adopt them if the Government approved them. Although the noble Earl had said that he and his Friends intended to wash their hands of the Bill and to take no further steps with respect to it, yet he (the Duke of Newcastle) was anxious that the Bill should pass in such a form as would prove beneficial and effect the object for which it was introduced; with this aspiration and hope, he trusted that other noble Lords would make such suggestions as they might think would conduce to that object. He had, in moving this Resolution, made a short statement and did not deem it necessary to enter into further details as to the Bill, but he would, either in reply to objections to the second reading or in Committee, give any explanations deemed necessary. The noble Duke moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.

THE EARL OF DERBY took this opportunity of observing to the noble Marquess, with reference to his proposed Amendment, that a division was taken in the House of Commons, and a specific vote was given in favour of excluding the word "not" from the travelling expenses clause, and if, against the sense of the House of Commons, the word were inserted, he thought that it would add great force to the argument of his noble and learned Friend as to not adding Amendments likely to endanger the Bill in the other House.

On Question, agreed to: Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House To-morrow.

EPISCOPAL AND CAPITULAR ESTATES MANAGEMENT BILL.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

MR. CAYLEY moved the following proviso—

"Provided always, that in computing the due regard to be paid to the just and reasonable claims of the present holders of lands under lease or otherwise, arising from the long-continued practice of renewal, the basis of compensation shall be that laid down by the Episcopal and Capitular Revenues Commissioners in their Report of 1850; and, where that may not be applicable, to the recommendations laid down in the Lords' Report on the same subject in 1851."

The Committee would remember that in 1849 the whole question of church property was referred to a Commission of which the Earl of Harrowby was chairman, and which was constituted of gentlemen whose impartiality was unimpeachable. They made their Report in 1850. The conclusion to which they arrived was, that the lessees were entitled to considerable compensation, and a basis on which such compensation should be given was laid down. It was the recommendation of that Commission that he wished substantially to incorporate in the proviso he had moved. The lessees complained that the basis was vague and indefinite, and he on their behalf now asked that a more specific arrangement might be made. The object, therefore, was to define more clearly the mode in which the damages, so to speak, to be awarded to the lessees in consequence of the interference of Parliament should be assessed.

MR. LASLETT opposed the clause, on the ground that he would not consent to fritter away the property of the Church. He considered that the leaseholders and copyholders had already obtained a very great boon by the system of enfranchisement. The Church Estates Commissioners had behaved in the most fair and equitable manner, and he would venture to say that every man who had enfranchised his estates under the Commissioners had found that their value had been increased from 10 to 20 per cent. There was no evidence to show that any interference with the property of the Church was necessary, and he asked the Committee whether they were prepared to give millions of money in the form of compensation to individuals who were not entitled to it? If any claims to compensation were set up, let those claims be decided by the courts of common law, but he for one could not consent to see the property of the Church frittered away in the manner in which it would be dissipated if the clause of the hon. Member for North Yorkshire should be adopted. The Bill was at present a permissive measure, and he objected to the proposed clause because it would render the Bill a compulsory measure.

Mr. SPOONER said, he should support the proviso on the ground that Parliament had already altered the relative position of lessors and lessees greatly to the disadvantage of the latter, unless some further consideration were shown them. The object of the clause was to define the manner in which the rights of lessees should be considered, and to afford clearer instructions to the Commissioners with regard to the mode of maintaining those rights. The great question was, whether the Commissioners had really and fairly carried out the intentions of Parliament? He contended that they had not. He complained that the Commissioners had adopted a scale of tables which was decidedly unfavourable to the annuitants, instead of basing their arrangements upon tables which had been adopted by the Government in other cases, and which were much more fair to both parties. He considered that it was for the interest of the Church that the lessees should be fairly dealt with, and should receive a fair compensation. There was an existing right on the part of the lessees arising from a practice of renewal which had existed for three centuries, and that right ought to be recognised and fairly valued in the arrangements which were made for renewals. He must say that he thought the Church Commissioners had mistaken the duty which Parliament had imposed upon them. It appeared to him that they considered that they were only Commissioners for the Church, whereas Parliament intended them to act for both parties. He thought the Commissioners had acted upon a wrong principle, and he hoped that to prevent their proceeding in the same course the Committee would assent to this clause.

Mr. GOULBURN said, it was proposed to revert to the recommendations of the Commission which had been embodied in a Bill that was brought forward in the other House of Parliament, and referred to a Select Committee. The parties who then opposed the Bill were the lessees themselves, who objected to it as imposing a permanent charge on their estates; but on the fullest consideration the House of Lords came to a different conclusion, and adopted the system at present in force, and under which in three years property to the value of several millions had been enfranchised. If they were prepared to go back to the system of having a large rent-charge imposed instead of permanent enfranchisement, they must enter into some more detailed regulations than could possibly be effected under a Bill which there remained but a short time to dispose of. He thought, therefore, they should not hesitate on the present occasion to reject the proviso.

Mr. MULLINGS contended that the right hon. Gentleman had not said anything to destroy the force of the principle for which the hon. Member for Yorkshire contended. He was sure that every Member of that House was willing to give the Church its due; but he thought the tenant was entitled to consideration also, and he was of opinion that his claims had not been treated upon a fair principle.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that no doubt these lessees were under Act of Parliament; but it was quite competent for the Legislature to say, even at this great distance of time, that, having regard to the value of lives, great errors had been made in the manner of conferring those leases, and that those errors should now be corrected. The hon. Member for Yorkshire now contended that the lessees had not been fairly treated in this matter. That was a question which had been very much discussed, and he could not understand why the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goulburn) should think that the Report of the Lords' Committee should be exclusively followed, and that no other terms than those specified in their Report should be adopted. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Cayley) said that due regard had not been paid to lessees, and that their terms should be allowed. He should be sorry to make this Bill other than a voluntary Bill, and thought that the hon. Member would improve the clause by striking out the word "shall," and inserting words giving the Commissioners a discretion as to whether they should follow the recommendations in the Report of the Commission.

Mr. J. A. SMITH was most grateful to the hon. Member for Yorkshire for his proposition, which he trusted would be heartily accepted by the House. As to the system, the real nature of which he should be sorry to characterise as he regarded it, which the Church had formerly pursued, of valuing their own interest at 3 per cent and charging the lessees 5 per cent, it had received its deathblow under the evidence of the late Bishop of Lincoln.

Mr. CAYLEY said, he was quite ready to adopt the noble Lord's suggestion, and to substitute for the term "shall," the words "may, at the discretion and with the approval of the Church Estates Commissioners."

Proviso, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. CAYLEY then moved the following proviso—

"Provided always, that in all computations in any way dependent on the duration of lives, the expectation of life shall be calculated at the rate of 3*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* per centum; and, so far as such rate can be applied, according to the data on which the life tables are founded which were appended to and published in the 13th annual Report of the Registrar General of Births, Deaths, and Marriages in England, and such computation shall be made thereby at a uniform rate of interest."

Mr. GOULBURN objected to the framing of any computations of this important nature upon any other than the most authoritative tables; as to the tables proposed, there were no means before him of estimating their value, for they were not in the library of the House.

Mr. J. A. SMITH supported the clause.

Mr. CAYLEY assured the Committee that he had been actuated by no other motive in selecting the Registrar General's tables than that the statistics in that department afforded, in his opinion, the fairest data for all parties concerned as to the general life of the country. In point of fact, Mr. Farr's were rather more favourable to the Church than to the lessees.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that, as to the general propriety of the principle, that the exploded Carlisle tables should not be acted upon for these computations, that was clearly expedient; but, on the other hand, he was of opinion that the proviso now under consideration would not furnish anything like a workable rule. It was very difficult to decide what tables would be most applicable for the purpose, and he conceived that the best course would be for the hon. Gentleman to leave this point for further consideration, and to bring up an amended clause on the Report. He should himself be most ready to afford his best assistance to the hon. Gentleman in devising a rule on the subject.

Mr. CAYLEY would gladly avail himself of the hon. and learned Gentleman's offer, and postpone the proviso accordingly.

Proviso postponed.

Mr. HENLEY remarked that it was important that the same set of tables should be taken for basis which had been used by the parties themselves in entering into existing contracts, otherwise they would run the risk of selling a life on one valuation, and buying it on another.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL then moved clauses relative to the investment and application of the moneys which are to be paid into the Bank of England under the 6th section of the Act; also in respect of purchases and exchanges; also in respect to the apportionment of moneys between the Church Estates Commissioners and Ecclesiastical Corporations and to the application thereof, which were agreed to without discussion.

"The proviso contained in the first section of the said recited Act, with reference to the sale or exchange of tithes or tithe rent-charges, or land or hereditaments allotted or assigned in lieu of tithes, shall be and the same is hereby repealed; and all the moneys so paid or to be paid over to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England under the foregoing provision which may have been produced by the sale, purchase, or exchange of tithes or tithe rent-charges, or land or hereditaments assigned or allotted in lieu of tithes, which formed part of the endowment of any ecclesiastical corporation prior to the passing of the said Act, shall be subject to the provisions relating to local claims which are contained in the 67th section of the Act passed in the third and fourth years of Her Majesty's reign, chap. 113. And in every case in which any money shall as aforesaid be paid over to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England in respect of surplus, the last-mentioned Commissioners shall, in the annual Report to be next thereafter made by them to the Secretary of State, specify the period at which at the time of the settlement of the terms of the sale, purchase, or exchange in respect of which such payment was made, it was estimated that any and every previously subsisting lease or grant of the tithes or land thereby dealt with would have expired."

Mr. MOWBRAY proposed, as an Amendment, to leave out all the words after "exchange of," and insert—

"Any lands, tithes, or hereditaments whatsoever which formed part of the endowment of any ecclesiastical corporation prior to the passing of the said Act shall be subject to the following proviso—that in any application and expenditure of the said moneys due consideration shall be had of the spiritual wants and circumstances of the places in which such lands or hereditaments shall be situated, or such tithes shall have theretofore arisen, anything in any Act contained to the contrary notwithstanding.”

The hon. Gentleman observed that it was calculated that within ten years after the passing of the Act of 1840 not less than 200,000*l.* had been subtracted from the diocese of Durham, and applied to the purposes of the Act in other parts of England. He knew it had been said that the spiritual wants of the diocese of Durham were not so pressing as those of other dioceses, and on this ground the appropriation of the revenues of the see of Durham to which he had alluded had been justified; but he thought it could be easily shown that the spiritual necessities of that diocese fully equalled those of any other district. Even if that were not the case, however, he thought it was only a matter of justice that revenues arising within a particular diocese should be applied to the purposes of that diocese, so far as they were needed. During the ten years subsequent to 1840 the increase of population within the diocese of Durham had been double the increase that had taken place in any other similar district throughout England and Wales. The want of church accommodation in five of the principal towns of the diocese—Gateshead, Newcastle, South Shields, Sunderland, and Tynemouth—was so great that independently of the sittings provided by all the religious bodies in those towns, no less than 38,000 additional sittings were required. He hoped, therefore, that the Government would take into consideration the operation of the Act of 1840, and that the alienation of the revenues of the diocese of Durham would not be continued.

Lord JOHN RUSSELL said, he must object to the proposal of the hon. Gentleman, because its adoption would subvert all the principles established by the various Acts with respect to the Ecclesiastical Commission. When the Commission first reported, in 1835, it was proposed that attention should be paid to the spiritual wants of various parts of the country, and the West Riding of Yorkshire and other extensive districts were pointed out, where the number of churches was utterly disproportioned to the population. But, beyond this, the first proposal of the Commissioners was, that sums should be contributed from the revenues of certain sees, and especially from that of Durham, to furnish an addition to the revenues of other sees, which were then only eked out by preferments held in commendam. They had proceeded upon the general principle that the superfluous funds of one district should be taken to supply the wants of other districts, and in the West Riding of Yorkshire, in Cheshire, and in Lancashire, where there was not sufficient provision for the spiritual wants of the people, funds had thus been provided for the establishment of new districts. The hon. Member now proposed to subvert that principle in regard to Durham; but if subverted in one case it must be subverted in all. In 1840, in accordance with the Report of the Commission, an exception was made with respect to tithes, and it was provided that regard should be had, in the appropriation of the funds, to the wants of the districts in which the tithes arose. He thought it might fairly be said that those tithes were given for the especial purposes of the parishes in which they were collected; but the same could not be said in respect to certain lands, the property of the Church, the produce of which might be applied to ecclesiastical purposes in other districts. It had, therefore, been laid down in the first Report that the property of the Church in one district might properly be applied to relieve the spiritual wants of another district. He could not agree to the Amendment; but he thought that the attention of Parliament should be directed more closely than had hitherto been the case to the appropriation of these funds. He considered that they should have a more specific account than had hitherto been afforded of the appropriation of the funds, and ascertain that they were really applied for the advantage of populous places where considerable spiritual destitution existed. He did not think that the diocese of Durham had had much reason to complain, for he found that 19,000*l.* had been appropriated to that diocese for the augmentation of livings, 7,500*l.* for the endowment of new parishes, and 2,300*l.* for the building of parsonage houses, besides donations to the Durham University. He did not think the diocese of Durham had been neglected, but he conceived that the House should have returns placed before it which would show the general disposition of the funds.

MR. BLACKETT considered that the attention of Parliament must speedily be called to the necessity of providing for the spiritual wants of the diocese of Durham from the funds which were now drawn from that diocese and applied to other districts.

MR. APSLEY PELLATT moved—

"That so much of the 11th section of the said recited Act as excepts the dean and canons of the cathedral church of Christ in Oxford from the operation thereof shall be repealed."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL explained that, if the dean and canons of Christ Church were subjected to the operation of the Act, they would be invested with powers in direct violation of the trusts upon which they held certain property, and on that account they had been exempted from its operation.

Motion negatived.

Other clauses moved and agreed to.

LORD SEYMOUR said, he would not oppose this Vote, but he hoped that the future President of the Board, whoever he might be, would try to reduce the expenditure. He did not think that both a secretary and an assistant secretary would be required, if the business of the Board was limited to a general supervision. The inspectors, it appeared, had 5,350*l.* It was said that nearly the whole of that would be repaid by the local boards; but as far as the Members of that House were concerned, that was no sufficient answer. The people had repudiated these expensive processes. First, they had an inquiry forced upon them, to which they objected; next, there were the expenses of the survey, which they were called upon to repay. He would not, however, oppose the Vote, as it was only temporary.

MR. HUME said, that he approved of the constitution of the Board of Health on the ground that it would relieve the House of a great deal of private business. He wished to see that Board placed on a right principle, but he objected to the men who composed it, and he was sure that by an alteration there, the interests of the department would be materially promoted. With respect to Mr. Chadwick, he did not wish to throw any slur on the past services of that gentleman. He knew him to be a man of great talent, and he believed that he would be found useful in some other departments of the public service, but he certainly did not approve of his remaining any longer in connection with a Board, in the management of whose business he had undoubtedly displayed want of judgment. He did not wish to see him any longer in the Board of Health, but he hoped that the Government would find employment for him in some other department, where his great powers of inquiry and grasping research might be made available for the interests of the country. In what he said on a former occasion he had no intention of depreciating the former services of Mr. Chadwick.

SIR G. PECHELL thought that the Vote was excessive, and that the office expenses were unreasonably large. The whole system should be remodelled, and inquiry was inevitable. He admitted the great talents and the important public services of Mr. Chadwick—in particular his exertions in connection with the Poor Laws—but he was of opinion, with the hon. Member for Montrose, that his connection with the Board of Health should no longer be continued, for he had unfortunately contributed to the unpopularity of that Board, and so impaired in some degree its usefulness. He complained that the Board of Health seemed to spend a good deal of time in circulating the pamphlets of Dr. Southwood Smith.

MR. WILKINSON, as a friend of Dr. Southwood Smith, could not but regret that that gentleman, a man of urbane manners and fine abilities, should have fallen a victim to the great unpopularity of Mr. Chadwick. Provision had been made, or was going to be made, for giving Mr. Chadwick a retiring allowance, and he thought that a similar measure of justice should be awarded to Dr. Smith.

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH said, that the Estimate was altogether a temporary and experimental Estimate; it would be for the new President to consider what ought to be the composition of the Board, and he was sure that the arrangements would be on the most economical scale compatible with efficiency. As to an assistant secretary, it was his opinion that such an officer was essential to the working of the business of the Board, but this, as well as other points, would be for the decision of the President.

Vote agreed to, as were also the following Votes for salaries and allowances in the public departments other than legal—

(2.) 149,859*l.*, Departments (other than Legal) heretofore charged on Consolidated Fund.

(3.) 849,402*l.*, Law Courts and Legal Charges heretofore charged on Consolidated Fund.

(4.) 109,634*l.*, Miscellaneous Charges heretofore charged on Consolidated Fund.

PUBLIC HEALTH (RETIRING ALLOWANCE).

House in Committee.

MR. HUME hoped that the Government would take care to find some suitable employment for Mr. Chadwick, who, though at present in ill health, had before him the prospect of many years in which he might do good service to the public.

MR. J. WILSON said, it was an invariable rule with the Government in all cases where Parliament gave the discretion of granting pensions to public officers, to avail itself of any opportunity for finding active employment for such pensioners as should be capable of fulfilling it; and this rule would not be lost sight of in the case of Mr. Chadwick, confessedly a gentleman well adapted, when in health, for performing valuable public service.

Resolved,

"That the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury be authorised to direct the payment, out of the moneys that may be voted by Parliament, of a Retiring Allowance to one of the Members of the General Board of Health, whose office may be abolished by any Act of the present Session."

APPOINTMENT OF MR. LAWLEY TO THE GOVERNORSHIP OF SOUTH AUSTRALIA.

On the Order of the Day for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of Ways and Means,

SIR GEORGE GREY:—Sir, the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) has given notice of his intention to call the attention of the House to the circumstances under which Her Majesty has been pleased to appoint the hon. Francis Lawley to the office of Governor of South Australia. Circumstances, Sir, have come to my knowledge within the last few days which induced me, not long ago, to address a note to the right hon. Baronet to say that I was anxious before he addressed the House in pursuance of that notice to make a statement to the House, which with its permission I will now proceed to do. Of course, after I have made that statement it will be for the right hon. Baronet or any other hon. Member to adopt such course as his sense of public duty may lead him to think fitting. I am desirous in the first place—as I am responsible for submitting to Her Majesty the name of Mr. Lawley for appointment to the governorship of South Australia—to state frankly and unreservedly at once the circumstances under which I submitted that advice to Her Majesty. When I was intrusted with the seals of the Colonial Department, but a day or two before I had actually received them from Her Majesty, I had several conferences with the Duke of Newcastle, my immediate predecessor, in which was stated the various matters of business then pending in that department, over which he had presided. Among other things he communicated to me the arrangements which he had recently made with respect to filling up various important colonial governments which were becoming in course of time vacant. He stated to me the arrangements he had made with respect to the governments of Canada, of New Brunswick, and of Norfolk Island. He stated that Sir Charles Fitzroy's term of service having expired some time ago, it had been intimated to him that he would be released from his duties in the course of the present year, and he had submitted to Her Majesty the name of Sir William Denison, the present Governor of Van Diemen's Land, as the successor to Sir Charles Fitzroy, in New South Wales. The noble Duke told me also that he had submitted to Her Majesty the name of Sir Henry Young, the present Governor of South Australia, for the governorship of New Zealand, which had become vacant by the appointment of the Governor of New Zealand to be the Governor of the Cape of Good Hope. He then informed me that, being of opinion that among gentlemen administering the government of other colonies of less importance there was no one who had particular claims on the grounds of public service or public conduct, upon the consideration of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, he had offered the governorship of South Australia to Mr. Lawley. He stated to me that his acquaintance with Mr. Lawley was not of above six months duration, but that from the acquaintance which he had had, and the opinion which he had received of Mr. Lawley's character from those in whom he could place confidence, he was of opinion that it was desirable that a gentleman in his position, of his character, and with his abilities, should accept colonial service under the Crown. He stated to me that he had been anxious to obtain the services of Mr. Lawley as Governor of South Australia, but that, as he was then on the point of surrendering the seals of the Colonial Office, he had requested Mr. Lawley to give him an immediate decision with respect to whether he was, or was not, willing to accept the governorship of South Australia. Mr. Lawley was inclined to accept the governorship, but was anxious, as a man must naturally be under such circumstances, to hold some communication with his family and his friends before he gave a decision which might affect the whole course of his future life. He asked, therefore, that a delay of a few days might be given him for deliberation. The Duke of Newcastle informed me that he had stated, in answer to that request, to Mr. Lawley, that, as he only held the seals of the Colonial Department till I had received those seals, as I should do on the next or following day, and as he should merely transact the business of the department while I was absent from London during my re-election, he did not feel that he could give the three days for deliberation which Mr. Lawley had asked for, but that he must give an affirmative or negative decision at once. He undertook, however, if the decision were a negative one, to mention the name of Mr. Lawley to me, to state all that had passed with respect to his appointment, and to inform me that had he remained Secretary of State for the Colonies he should have submitted the name of Mr. Lawley to Her Majesty for appointment to the governorship of South Australia, if Mr. Lawley, after the few days' deliberation he desired, had been disposed to accept that appointment. I am anxious to state frankly and unreservedly to the House—and I have the Duke of Newcastle's full permission to do so—what passed between us on the occasion to which I refer. Mr. Lawley was wholly unknown to me. I have seen him engaged within this House, and have sat on the same side of the House with him during the last year and a half; but certainly I have never been thrown into his society, nor been upon such terms with him as could authorise me to claim him as the most common acquaintance. The Duke of Newcastle informed me that he thought it right to state the only drawback which in his opinion might be alleged against the appointment of Mr. Lawley arose from a fact which, under the circumstances, he did not consider to be a sufficient bar to his appointment. The Duke of Newcastle told me that, like many young men, I fear, in his position in society, he had early in life been addicted to—I hardly know how to describe it in ordinary language, but all will understand what I mean—had been unfortunately “on the turf.” He had, in early life, been inclined to horse-racing, a habit adopted in common with many other men of high rank and society in this country; but he submitted to me that, so far from thinking this circumstance a bar to the appointment of Mr. Lawley, or as constituting an objection to his appointment, it was, on the contrary, a recommendation under the circumstances which I am about to state. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite may laugh, but I certainly should not have expected that a party which recognised the late lamented Lord George Bentinck as their leader in this House, and who have served under the Government of Lord Derby, would have considered this as an objection. I certainly should not have thought to have heard them sneer at the employment of a person who had been so engaged, or consider that it was an absolute disqualification for office that a man had been so engaged. I pass that by, however, because if hon. Gentlemen will wait till they hear the whole facts, perhaps they will find that their sneers might have been spared. The Duke of Newcastle told me that Mr. Lawley had become deeply impressed with the conviction that the course was one which could not be abandoned too early; and he had stated that his earnest desire was to break off from those habits in which, unfortunately, I say, and say it honestly, he had been employed. Mr. Lawley stated that he had accepted the office of private secretary to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer with a view to engage himself in higher and more useful pursuits, and that his desire for colonial government was partly prompted by a wish that he might be removed absolutely beyond the reach of temptation, and a recurrence to those habits which it had been his anxious desire to break off. The Duke of Newcastle further informed me that he did not consider I was bound by what had passed between himself and Mr. Lawley. He gave me his opinion, as I have already stated, that Mr. Lawley was well qualified for the appointment in question, and that it would conduce to the public service if he were so appointed. When I accepted the seals of the Colonial Office, I found that the governorship of South Australia was vacant by Her Majesty having approved of the appointment of Sir Henry Young, the then Governor of that colony, to another important government. I had not, as I said before, the slightest personal acquaintance with Mr. Lawley; and under these circumstances I did not feel myself bound, after what had passed between the Duke of Newcastle and myself, to renew the offer of that appointment to Mr. Lawley. I understood that I was perfectly free; and wishing to shrink from no responsibility in this matter, I wish to state explicitly to the House that I considered myself perfectly free to submit to Her Majesty the name of any gentleman for the appointment of Governor of South Australia. So much was I under that conviction, that I had actually made inquiries with respect to another gentleman, in order to ascertain his qualifications and his willingness to undertake that office, and I intended to have made the offer to that other gentleman, if, under all the circumstances, he had been willing to accept it. But before any decisive steps were taken with respect to filling up this government—about three weeks ago, or less—I received a communication through my private secretary from Mr. Lawley, which, I confess, gave a very different aspect to the case from that in which I had before viewed it. I was then informed, for the first time, that Mr. Lawley was under a different impression from that under which the Duke of Newcastle was, and what he had communicated to me as his impression, and which, in justice to the Duke of Newcastle, I am bound to say, he has since most explicitly confirmed. Mr. Lawley stated that he conceived, from what had passed between the Duke of Newcastle and himself, that he was not to be considered as having declined the appointment—that the time for which he asked had been allowed him, in order to consider the subject—and that for a period, during the continuance of the present Session, he had understood that it was at his option either to decline or accept the appointment. He stated that he had made up his mind, upon full consideration and communication with those with whom he had previously desired to consult, to accept the governorship of South Australia, and he expressed some surprise that he had not received any communication from me on the subject. I received this information, certainly, with some surprise, because it was contrary to the impressions which, as I have already said, I had formed from the statement of the Duke of Newcastle. I spoke to a right hon. Friend of mine, a relative of Mr. Lawley, in this House, and I found that he was under the same impression as Mr. Lawley, and that not only Mr. Lawley, but that his family and friends were under the impression that the governorship of the colony had been offered to him, and that it was in his power to decline or accept the office. I stated this fact to the Duke of Newcastle; and, again, I am bound to say, in justification of the noble Duke, he stated that the impression existing in the mind of Mr. Lawley, and of his friends, was not that which they were warranted in entertaining; that Mr. Lawley had not, it was true, declined the appointment, and that the Duke of Newcastle had undertaken to mention it to me; but that I was as free to deal with the appointment as if, instead of being a colleague of the noble Duke's, I had succeeded him as a political opponent. With me, therefore, must rest the responsibility of having submitted the name of Mr. Lawley to Her Majesty, for the appointment to the governorship of the colony of South Australia. I had to consider what my public duty required of me. I knew nothing whatever of Mr. Lawley—nothing I may say against him, not even a whisper of suspicion with respect to any transactions in which he had been engaged; and, as honourable men as any that live in this country are engaged on the turf and in horse-racing, I did not think the circumstance of Mr. Lawley having been so concerned constituted a sufficient reason why I, in the position in which I stood, should reverse the decision to which the Duke of Newcastle had come to with respect to the person to be appointed to the governorship of an important colony. Upon the other hand, I knew nothing of Mr. Lawley, and not having known anything of him, I did not, as I have said before, feel justified in making any renewed offer to him. He certainly is not a gentleman to whom—entirely from the absence of all knowledge of him, whether positive or negative, as regards his character—to whom

I should have offered the government, nor was his a name which I should have submitted to Her Majesty for the Governor of an important colony. But when I found that he had been for some weeks under the impression that he was to succeed Sir Henry Young in the government of South Australia—when I found from inquiries among his friends, and when, from contemporaries at the University—who certainly cannot be considered as inferior judges of a man's abilities, where he obtained high distinction—I received the highest testimonials as to the ability and character of Mr. Lawley—I felt that I was in this position—I must either submit his name to Her Majesty, confiding in the assurances of those who had the means of knowing him, and all whose opinions would lead me to suppose that he was admirably qualified for the post which he desired to occupy; or, upon the other hand, without a breath of suspicion having reached me against Mr. Lawley, that I should be acting contrary to their opinions by pronouncing his unfitness for the appointment, in refusing to submit his name to Her Majesty, and thus have cast a stigma upon him which was wholly unmerited. Having obtained all the information I could from every quarter with respect to the ability of Mr. Lawley, I told my right hon. Friend (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), that although I knew nothing of that gentleman, and should not have chosen him myself, still that under all the circumstances of the case I was prepared, in accordance with his opinion, with that of the Duke of Newcastle, and of others who knew Mr. Lawley, and had had opportunities of judging of his character which I did not possess, rather than do any injury or wrong to him, and believing from all that I had heard that he would make an efficient Governor of South Australia, to submit his name to Her Majesty for that appointment. I did so submit the name to Her Majesty, and Her Majesty approved the appointment. For that recommendation I am responsible to Her Majesty, and for Her Majesty's approval of Mr. Lawley's appointment I alone am responsible. Immediately after that appointment was known—and it was known, I think, on the very day on which I received Her Majesty's approval of the appointment—the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich placed upon the notice paper of the House a question to be addressed to me on the following day.

Sir G. Grey

asking whether Mr. Lawley had been appointed, and whether it was the intention of the Government to submit the name of Mr. Lawley to Her Majesty for appointment as Governor of South Australia, or any other colony. When I saw that notice, I can assure the House I had not even a suspicion of any circumstances connected with Mr. Lawley to which that notice could point. I came down to the House prepared to have heard from the right hon. Baronet the grounds which would have justified his putting a question which certainly was one of an unusual character. The right hon. Baronet stated no grounds for putting his question, and I need not say I do not complain of this, because the right hon. Baronet is a political opponent, and was not bound to communicate to me any public or private information which he possessed. From that day to this I have received not the slightest information with respect to the grounds upon which that question was put. I answered the question, therefore, in the only way in which I could answer it in accordance with the strictest truth, namely, that Her Majesty had been advised to appoint Mr. Lawley to the government of South Australia, and that I had advised the appointment. That question was put to me this day week, and I stated, in private to Members of this House, that I was utterly at a loss to know what that question pointed at, and that I should be thankful to be informed, in order that any valid objection to Mr. Lawley might have been investigated fairly and fully, but I was unable to take the slightest movement towards instituting such an inquiry. I should state that immediately before I submitted the name of Mr. Lawley to Her Majesty, I spoke to my right hon. Friend the Recorder of London (Mr. Stuart Wortley), in order to ascertain what his impressions were with respect to the effect of what had passed between the Duke of Newcastle and Mr. Lawley with respect to this appointment. He, as I should have expected from him, fairly told me what the Duke of Newcastle had told me before, namely, that Mr. Lawley had been "upon the turf," and he felt that that might be an objection; but he stated at the same time, in the most explicit terms which I could desire, that there was not a single debt or liability outstanding to which Mr. Lawley was now subject, or in order to evade which he might be desirous of leaving this country on receiving the appointment. The facts, therefore, as they were known to me were—that Mr. Lawley, as I have said has been the case with too many young men to their loss, and it may be to their ultimate ruin, had been early engaged in transactions on “the turf;” but that not one whisper of dishonourable conduct in connection with that pursuit had then reached or has yet reached me; and that there was no outstanding debt or liability to which Mr. Lawley was subject on that account. If there had been, I should have felt that I was departing widely from my duty as a Minister of the Crown in submitting to Her Majesty the name of a gentleman with whom it might be an object to remove himself from the reach of those means which might be used against him in order to enforce the settlement of his liabilities. Upon this point the statement made to me by my right hon. Friend the Recorder of London was clear and unambiguous. On Friday last, after the morning sitting of the House, I returned to my office, and shortly before six o’clock, when about to return to the House, the Duke of Newcastle came to my room, and told me that he felt it his duty to come to me and inform me at the earliest moment he could, that from two separate quarters, in the course of that day, he had received information of rumours being in circulation highly injurious to the character of Mr. Lawley. He did not tell me from whom the information was derived, but stated that it was received in one instance from a Peer, and in the other from a right hon. Gentleman well known to himself as well as to me, but whose name he did not state. He told me the nature of those rumours, and as I am anxious that the House should be in full possession of all the circumstances connected with the case, hon. Members will think, perhaps, that I am only doing my duty if I state what was the nature of those rumours which were stated to me in the course of conversation. The communication was made in conversation, and I have no record of it, but I believe I shall be able to state the purport. The Duke of Newcastle stated that he had been informed that very recently Mr. Lawley had become subject to heavy liabilities and debts in connection with transactions on the turf. He told me besides that there were rumours of a much more serious character as affecting the conduct, position, and character of Mr. Lawley—namely, that Mr. Lawley had availed himself of the official knowledge acquired as private secretary to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to engage in extensive speculations in the funds. The Duke of Newcastle was on his way to the House of Lords, and was obliged to leave me almost immediately. I believe that I stated to him the course I should pursue under these circumstances, but at all events the purport of what the noble Duke stated to me I have now stated to the House, and there could be no doubt as to the course which I ought immediately to adopt. I immediately put aside the business on which I was engaged, and addressed a letter to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer—Mr. Lawley then being out of town—and I told him the extreme surprise and concern with which I had just received this information from the Duke of Newcastle. I told him that I was assured of his entire concurrence in what I said, and that it would likewise meet with the concurrence of the Duke of Newcastle, that if there was any foundation of truth in these rumours it would be impossible that the appointment of Mr. Lawley could proceed. I stated my most earnest hope that he would be able to disprove the truth of these rumours, and that they would be found to be destitute of foundation, and that until the receipt of satisfactory information I should suspend all further proceedings with respect to the appointment of Mr. Lawley; and that in justice to him, in justice to myself, in justice to the Government, and in justice to the colony to which he was to be appointed, these reports should be communicated to Mr. Lawley at the earliest opportunity in order that he might have the means and opportunity which every man was justly entitled to, of knowing what had been said in regard to him, and having every opportunity of explaining or refuting the charges. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer immediately came to me. He told me that Mr. Lawley was out of town, that he would be in London on the following night, and I asked him what course it would be best to take with the view of bringing these facts and rumours under the notice of Mr. Lawley. He said that Mr. Lawley was to be in town the next day, and asked my opinion as to whether it was desirable that he should transmit by the post of that evening my letter to him to Mr. Lawley. As Mr. Lawley was to be in town the following day, we thought that, by sending the letter, we might incur the risk of his not only receiving it, and I thought the best way was, that my right hon. Friend should write to Mr. Lawley to say that he had received such a letter, in order to ensure his early arrival in town. On Monday morning the House sat at twelve o'clock. I was present, and asked my right hon. Friend the Recorder of London (Mr. Stuart Wortley) whether he had seen Mr. Lawley, and I was informed by him that Mr. Lawley had gone to my office in Downing-street with a view to see me there. I was in this House at the time, and my private secretary, who is also a Member of this House, was likewise here. Very shortly after that communication was made to me, after I had been informed of Mr. Lawley's desire to see me, with the view of completely denying the truth of these reports, I received through my private secretary a letter addressed to him, which he put into my hands in this House, and which contained, as it appeared to me, a clear, satisfactory, and conclusive denial of by far the most serious charge and imputation which had been brought against Mr. Lawley, namely, the fact of his having speculated in the funds upon his official information as the private secretary of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I transmitted that letter immediately to the Duke of Newcastle, because, as it was through his Grace alone that these reports had reached me, I was desirous that he should see the terms in which the charges had been met, and I was anxious not to rely wholly on my own judgment, though I fairly avow that in writing to his Grace, I stated my belief that the terms in which Mr. Lawley's denial was expressed were quite conclusive in regard to by far the most serious of these imputations. The Duke of Newcastle concurred with me in that view. Subsequently, on meeting the Recorder of London, he renewed to me, as he was empowered to do, the direct denial of there being any liability or debt existing to which Mr. Lawley could be subject, and with a view to avoid which he was desirous of leaving this country. And with reference to that matter, I am anxious to state that in the only interview which I had with Mr. Lawley—the only opportunity which I had of speaking to him on the subject of his appointment—he appeared desirous to fix a time for his departure from this country which I thought too remote, and I told him that if he accepted the appointment I should hold him liable to proceed to the colony whenever I required him to do so, without suiting his own convenience by waiting till a more distant period. I mention that circumstance, because I think it shows that in the only conversation which I had with Mr. Lawley, there was clearly in his mind no desire to leave this country, so as to avoid any liability to which he might be subject, and that, in truth, in accepting the appointment he contemplated a longer residence here than I thought consistent with the public interests to sanction. So matters stood until this day. The right hon. Baronet opposite, in the mean time, gave notice that he would call the attention of the House to the appointment; and I then thought that I should have the opportunity of making this statement to the House, in order that it might be known precisely under what circumstances this appointment had been made, and that I might have an opportunity of referring to the testimonials, certainly of the most satisfactory kind, so far as any man's judgment can be formed from such documents, which I had received as to the ability, the honour, and the integrity of Mr. Lawley. But in the course of this morning I received from my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer a communication which he made, no doubt, with the deepest regret and concern, and which I need not say I received with the same feelings. From that communication it appeared that Mr. Lawley had been engaged in transactions in the funds within the last few months which, to a certain extent, justified those rumours which had been stated to me, and with regard to which I had expressed my opinion—an opinion in which my noble Friend the Duke of Newcastle entirely concurred—that if there was any foundation of truth in them the appointment of Mr. Lawley could not proceed. It is due, in justice to Mr. Lawley, to state—and it is within the knowledge of my right hon. Friend that I am able to state with certainty—that the information with regard to these transactions is derived exclusively from Mr. Lawley himself. I am informed that late last night he felt it his duty to communicate to my right hon. Friend the facts, the purport of which was communicated to me to-day. I have stated before that the charge which I understood to have been made against Mr. Lawley was this: that he had availed himself of his official knowledge as private secretary to my right hon. Friend to engage in these speculations in the funds. I have no reason to believe that that is the case. I am informed that the speculations in which Mr. Lawley engaged were losing speculations and not gaining speculations. Mr. Lawley is entitled to the benefit of that statement; but, however he may be affected by it, I am bound to say that in my opinion it did not in the least affect my duty to the Crown, to this country, and to the colony, and I immediately addressed a letter to Her Majesty, expressing my great regret and concern that I had recently submitted for the approval of Her Majesty an appointment which I now felt it my imperative duty, under circumstances which had just come to my knowledge, humbly to advise Her Majesty to revoke. I believe I have now submitted the whole of this painful case. Painful I may say to me it has been to make this statement. Though I have thought it right to state what passed between the Duke of Newcastle and myself before I accepted the seals of the Colonial Office in correction of the impression which existed in the mind of Mr. Lawley and that of his Friends, yet I feel that the responsibility of submitting the name of Mr. Lawley to Her Majesty devolves no doubt on myself; and any censure which the House may feel is due to that act I will humbly and patiently submit to, though, as I have already said, the motives which influenced me were such as I venture to think would have influenced any other man in my position. In the absence of the slightest shadow of suspicion which had been suggested to me as attaching to the integrity and honour of Mr. Lawley, and with the strong testimonials I had in my hand to his ability and qualifications from those in whom I had confidence, I think I could not have acted otherwise than I did. I believe I have now stated, fully, frankly, and unreservedly to the House all the circumstances of this transaction. Having done so, it is for the right hon. Baronet opposite to take any course which his sense of public duty may lead him to take with regard to this subject. I am at this moment absolutely in ignorance of the grounds upon which the right hon. Baronet placed his notice upon the paper. I am told that an application was made to him, before the facts I have stated were known, to ascertain whether he intended to impugn the appointment of Mr. Lawley upon public or private grounds, but that the right hon. Gentleman, in the exercise of a discretion which I do not question, declined to give any such information. If it had not been for Mr. Lawley's own act

—if he had not stated fully, freely, and unreservedly to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer the whole circumstances of his transactions in the funds—I should have come down to this House to-night ignorant of the grounds upon which the right hon. Baronet meant to impugn the appointment, and I might thereby have been led to make statements which I might afterwards deeply have regretted, but which Mr. Lawley has now prevented me from being induced to make by the statement which he has himself made. The appointment, as I said before, Her Majesty has been advised to revoke; and I may state here that, when Mr. Lawley made his statement last night, he felt that he was making a statement which would prove fatal to his prospects in the Colonies, and at once declared that he considered his appointment altogether at an end. I have only to add that if, after the statement I have made, the House wishes for further information upon the subject, or thinks that an investigation into all the circumstances of the case should take place, Her Majesty's Government is in the hands of the House and is ready and willing to agree to whatever may be considered necessary.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: notwithstanding the observations with which the right hon. Baronet has closed his speech, I beg to state that I am deeply sensible of the perfect candour with which the right hon. Gentleman has now addressed the House, and that I am no less sensible of the honourable feeling which has distinguished that speech. I can assure the right hon. Baronet that, whatever political differences may divide us, I do not believe that he is a man who would recommend to the Sovereign the appointment of any person to exercise the high and responsible duties of a Colonial Governor, unless he was satisfied of the fitness of that individual; and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will do me equal justice, and will believe that I have approached this painful subject solely and exclusively from a strong and paramount sense of public duty, arising from the deep interest which I naturally take in the welfare of our colonial dependencies. I had no desire to impede the fair advancement of a gentleman towards whom I did not feel, or could not feel, a shadow of personal enmity; nor could I have any desire to wound the feelings of the friends of that gentleman, many of whom are personal friends of my own. But I am unable to agree altogether in the opinion which appears to have been entertained by the Duke of Newcastle, and which the right hon. Baronet, as I understood him, has himself avowed of the personal fitness, irrespective of these painful rumours and transactions, of Mr. Lawley for the situation to which he was appointed. The right hon. Baronet has stated that I gave him no grounds for the question which I put to him this day week. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that if he thought I was deficient in courtesy in the course I then took, or wanting in fairness in not having held communication with him, with regard to the course which I intended to take to-day, no such discourtesy was meant by me. I deeply felt the difficulty and delicacy of the duty which I had undertaken. I was desirous not to say a word more upon this painful subject than I could possibly help; and I can assure the right hon. Baronet, in consequence of the reference which he has made to me, that it was not till within the last few hours that I could conclusively make up my mind as to the course which my public duty required me to take. I have said that I could not concur in the opinion of the Duke of Newcastle with regard to the personal fitness of Mr. Lawley for this appointment; but I think the right hon. Baronet will agree with me, that among the patronage of the Crown, which is exercised by the advisers of the Crown, there is scarcely any which ought to be exercised with greater care and with a more anxious and single-minded reference to the public interests than the appointment of governors for our colonies. Those appointments ought to be made in such a manner as not only to secure the satisfaction and confidence of this country, but what is still more important, to satisfy the colonists over whom the gentlemen so chosen are to preside, that these appointments have been made solely with reference to the interests and welfare of the colonies. If this is true generally, it is especially and peculiarly so with reference to the Australian Colonies at the present moment. The discoveries of gold have put these colonies in a most critical position. They require the anxious care and attention of the Imperial and of the Colonial Governments. The Colony of Victoria at a very recent period, I may without exaggeration say, was almost disorganised. The Colony of South Australia, immediately contiguous to Victoria,

although no discoveries of gold have been made within it, has undergone a period of great social and commercial disturbance; and it was desirable for the interests of that colony, and, indeed, of all the Australian Colonies, that any gentleman selected to be governor should possess statesman-like qualities and known abilities. He ought to be a man of great experience in public affairs, of great firmness, and of great judgment. He ought to be a man whose character should at once inspire confidence in his qualifications, and enable him to give a healthy moral tone to that society of which he is to be the head, and ought to be the leader and the guide. Now, sir, I do not think that I at all disparage the claims of Mr. Lawley—I think I say nothing to which the friends of Mr. Lawley can take any fair exception—when I state that, considering his age and position, and his limited experience in public affairs, the appointment of Mr. Lawley, under any circumstances, as governor of one of the Australian colonies at this moment, was one that was but too likely to excite feelings of dissatisfaction in the colony, and was one not likely to conduce to the advantage of those rising communities. But, irrespective of this consideration, when I gave notice of my intended Motion two days ago, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Recorder of London (Mr. Stuart Wortley) adverted to what he spoke of as calumnious rumours, and expressed very naturally his anxiety for an opportunity to meet and dispose of those rumours. The right hon. Baronet the Secretary for the Colonies has now again referred to these rumours. He has given fresh proof of their extended currency. They have been commented upon by the public press. [Sir GEORGE GREY: I had not seen them.] They have become the subject of remark in society; and under these circumstances I did feel that my public duty required that I should call the attention of the House and of the Government to this appointment, in order that, before Mr. Lawley left this country to undertake the government of the important colony of South Australia, these rumours, which had become current in every circle, might be set at rest one way or the other. I did feel that it was due to Mr. Lawley himself, that it was due to the Government who appointed him, but, above all, that it was due to the colony, that Mr. Lawley should not commence his career under the disadvantage of having these rumours preceding his arrival in the colony, and therefore under circumstances which could not but be disadvantageous to him as well as to those whom he was appointed to govern. It was, therefore, really as a matter of public duty, and in a spirit of fairness to all parties, that I did venture to give my opinion, that before Mr. Lawley commenced the important duties which the Government has assigned to him, these rumours should be disposed of one way or the other. After the speech which the right hon. Baronet has made, and after the distressing conclusion of that speech, I think it is hardly necessary for me to say that I should certainly not have considered that the mere fact of having been connected with the sport of horse-racing was of itself a disqualification for holding the office of Governor of South Australia or any other high appointment. I believe, without reference to party considerations, without regard to one side of the House or the other, I may affirm that noblemen and gentlemen of as high and unimpeachable honour as ever adorned society in this country have taken an interest in the sport of horse-racing; and that it would be an absurdity to contend that a mere taste for that sport was of itself a disqualification for holding office under the Crown; this, however, must be a question of degree, but I will not further press that subject. The right hon. Baronet has asked me what course I intend to take. To that I can return but one answer—the course taken by the right hon. Baronet himself has spared me from a painful duty. I think that, under the circumstances which have occurred, Mr. Lawley has acted as a gentleman in his position ought to have acted, and so far as I am concerned, nothing further will fall from me upon this subject. The subject must now be considered to be at an end. I cannot but think that the information which has been communicated to us justifies me in the course which I thought it my duty to take. I shall say no more upon that point, but shall conclude by expressing the hope, which I trust may be considered almost as superfluous, that the House will believe that nothing but a paramount sense of public duty has induced me to take any part at all in this transaction.

MR. STUART WORTLEY: I need not say that I rise upon the present occasion with feelings of the most painful nature, not on account of the explanation which I feel to be due to the House with respect to what took place upon a former evening, but because I feel that I have in my hands the interests of one who must ever be dear to me, and because I am apprehensive that any imprudent expression on my part would be dangerous to a reputation which hitherto has been untarnished. The right hon. Baronet the Secretary for the Colonies has expressed his regret that the right hon. Gentleman opposite has up to the present moment never intimated, either to the minister who was responsible for the appointment, or to the friends of Mr. Lawley, the nature of the charge which he intended to make—whether it was upon public grounds as to the fitness of the individual selected, or whether it was upon such private grounds as those which have been referred to this evening. Under these circumstances, there was nothing for Mr. Lawley and his friends to do but to collect from public rumour what it was that the right hon. Gentleman opposite meant, and that public rumour undoubtedly embodied the charges which have been already referred to. By far the gravest and most important of these charges was this, that Mr. Lawley had availed himself of his official knowledge as private Secretary to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to speculate in the funds. The moment that I heard that imputation I utterly disbelieved it. But before entering upon that subject, allow me to confirm some of the statements which have been made by the Colonial Secretary in justification of Mr. Lawley. I must tell the House, in the first place, that this appointment was obtained by Mr. Lawley solely by his own exertions. No person applied for it in his behalf; no influence was used by his relatives or others at the Colonial Office to obtain it for him; it was his merits, and his merits alone—his services in the last eighteen months, during which he has been a most able, efficient, and faithful servant of the Chancellor of the Exchequer—which recommended him to official men for that appointment. I myself heard of the appointment with surprise. At first I was informed that the appointment was to the governorship of West Australia, and as a relative of Mr. Lawley I more than once remonstrated, and expressed my regret that so able and so promising a man should thus place himself in exile. I found I was mistaken, and that the appointment was to South Australia. But even then it was with great reluctance that the friends of Mr. Lawley could approve of his leaving this country. When, however, we were told that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had recommended him to accept the appointment, and that it would afford him an opportunity of withdrawing from that unhappy connection which has been the unfortunate cause of all this mischief, we rejoiced that an opportunity, which I knew he was himself anxious to obtain, had been placed within his reach. A connection with the turf, as it is called, is unfortunately one from which a man cannot withdraw himself in a minute. He has contracted obligations to which he must be attentive in order to avert great losses at a future time, and it is impossible to withdraw himself from such a connection suddenly. I was consequently aware that prior to the time when this appointment was offered to him Mr. Lawley had not been able entirely to extricate himself; but I knew at the same time that he was anxiously desirous to do so as soon as possible, and it was upon that ground that his family were prepared to recommend him to accept the governorship of South Australia, though they certainly were of opinion that the acceptance of such an appointment on the part of a man with his connections, with his fortune, with his abilities, and his determination to devote them to the public service, and above all, with a seat in Parliament, would certainly involve some sacrifice. Not that I mean to depreciate so high and important an office as the governorship of South Australia; I merely state what our views were; but at all events Mr. Lawley was advised to accept the appointment. The right hon. Baronet the Secretary for the Colonies, as he has already stated to the House, came to me and asked me what was the understanding of Mr. Lawley's family with reference to what had passed between him and the Duke of Newcastle. My answer was, that we had all understood that the office was placed at Mr. Lawley's disposal, but that he had asked and obtained time to consider the subject. The right hon. Baronet, in the handsomest and kindest manner, immediately said that there was an end to all further question in regard to the appointment, and that he was willing to take the whole responsibility of Mr. Lawley's nomination. I then thought it my duty to state to the right hon. Baronet that Mr. Lawley had not only been on the turf, but had also incurred losses and embarrassments—that he had made a full statement of all his difficulties to his friends, and that care would be taken, he having considerable expectations, that by the time he left this country he should not be a single farthing in debt. Under these circumstances, I was much astonished when a question was put by the right hon. Baronet opposite on the subject. I should not have been astonished if the right hon. Baronet had at once stated his objection to the appointment to be on political grounds, for, when I considered Mr. Lawley's youth, I had no right to be surprised that some objection would be entertained. I applied to the right hon. Baronet, and asked him if it was his intention to follow his question by taking any other step. The right hon. Gentleman declined giving any information on the subject. I then asked him whether he would found his objections on public or private grounds. The right hon. Baronet again declined giving any information.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I did not decline giving information, but what I said was, that I was unable at that time to give an answer, but that I would let the right hon. Gentleman know my intention as soon as I possibly could.

MR. STUART WORTLEY: You said that you would give me an answer on the following Thursday, which was the day on which you were to bring forward your question. This was by word of mouth; but I had received a letter from the right hon. Gentleman stating that he could not tell me what his intentions were. Mr. Lawley was out of town at that time. I wrote to him immediately that it was necessary he should come to London. He came. I saw him the moment he arrived. He told me that he had seen attacks against him in the newspapers, not on private, but on public grounds, and frankly admitted that the appointment of so young a man to an office of such importance might very fairly be made the subject of comment and animadversion in the press. I told him that there were charges affecting his personal honour, which he must be prepared to meet if he intended to hold the appointment. I said I was unable to ascertain the grounds or purport of the Motion which the right hon. Baronet intended to make in this House, but I added it was rumoured, and that the rumour had reached the Duke of Newcastle and Sir George Grey, that he had availed himself of the official information which he obtained as private secretary to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the purpose of speculating in the funds. He denied that charge in the strongest and most indignant terms. I rejoiced that he did so, and advised him to write immediately to Sir George Grey to that effect. Such were the circumstances which led me upon a former occasion to refer to what I called the "calumnious rumours" which were afloat concerning Mr. Lawley. To this moment I believe I have Mr. Lawley's authority for saying that he never has used his official knowledge as private secretary to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the purpose of speculating in the funds; and, indeed, it is clear and manifest that he has never done so, for, as has been already stated, his speculations have been losing speculations, and have only increased his difficulties. Subsequently, however, he thought it right—having up to that time concealed the fact, under the false impression that he was bound not to disclose the names of others—to state to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he had been engaged in speculating in the funds, but that those speculations had been wholly unconnected with any official information which he might have possessed. Under these circumstances, Mr. Lawley does not complain in the slightest degree of the step which has been taken by the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for the Colonies; on the contrary, he has no doubt that the public service required it, and that, after such a great indiscretion as he had been guilty of, it was of course utterly impossible that his appointment could proceed. I have stated that it was by his own merits alone that he obtained this appointment. I do not rely upon my own opinion upon that point. It might be biased by partiality. Nor do I rely upon the opinion of his friends merely, but upon that of public men having the greatest opportunities of judging of Mr. Lawley, his capacity and qualifications. I hold in my hand a letter from one of the most distinguished public servants in the country—a gentleman unconnected with Mr. Lawley in politics—Mr. John Wood, Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue. He had frequently spoken to me about this appointment, and had referred in the highest terms to the ability and fitness of Mr. Lawley for the office. I asked him if he would have any objection to put his opinion upon paper. His words are these—ment. I could refer to my knowledge of him for very many years, and more particularly to my experience during the two Sessions he has acted as private secretary to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Sceldom has a day passed during that period in which I have not had communication with him, and this is by no means the first occasion on which I have expressed my admiration of his talents, his indefatigable industry, and his singular aptitude for business. These qualities are enhanced by a most amiable temper and an earnest sincerity, which are peculiarly valuable in official life. I am well aware that he has long entertained a partiality for colonial government, and has been desirous to qualify himself for it; and, much as I wish that he had remained in this country, I am in some degree reconciled to his going, believing that an honourable career of distinguished usefulness is before him."

That is the opinion of a disinterested and certainly most capable witness. But I have another testimony—not from a gentleman belonging to the same political party as Mr. Lawley—not from an old friend—but from a distinguished man, holding a high and important office. It is to the following effect—

"I shall much regret your departure from Downing Street, whoever may be your successor, and you have my hearty good wishes for your success in your government, of which I cannot have a doubt, for you will bring to the discharge of your duties talents, activity, and honesty of purpose, and every quality requisite to ensure success."

That is the opinion of the Chairman of the Board of Customs, Sir Thomas Freemantle. I feel it due to the Government who made this appointment to bring before the House these testimonies to the fitness of Mr. Lawley; and I do so also for the purpose of confirming what I have already said, that he obtained the appointment, not by the influence of friends, but by his own merits, and of showing that it was an honourable ambition which prompted him to accept it. I likewise wish to state that until a late hour last night neither his own family nor any Member of the Government could have been at all aware of his transactions in the funds. I can only repeat most emphatically that I believe on no occasion has Mr. Lawley used his official information for the purpose of assisting in these speculations. They are the unfortunate consequence of a habit acquired in former years, when he kept the society of men who indulged in gambling transactions of this description, but in no instance has he availed himself of his official position. If there be the slightest doubt of that, Mr. Lawley is willing to lay bare his breast, and submit to any inquiry or examination, either by a Committee or any other tribunal the House of Commons may think necessary. I have again to assert that, though there may be, as I deeply regret there are, reflections on his prudence, on his honour there are none—that though there may have been a connection with transactions of the kind referred to, yet that that connection was not of a nature that could in any way detract from his usefulness as a public servant; and I trust he will survive to resume, at some future time, the career from which he is at present displaced, with better hopes and under better auspices.

LORD DUDLEY STUART said, although he had not the honour of Mr. Lawley's acquaintance, and although it might seem strange that, sitting on the same side of the House, he did not even know that gentleman by sight, he was exceedingly desirous of having one question answered by the right hon. Gentleman the secretary for the Colonies, for the sake of Mr. Lawley himself, and he earnestly wished and expected the answer would be favourable to him. The right hon. Gentleman said that he had received information which satisfied him that Mr. Lawley, during the time he had filled the office of secretary to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, had not speculated in the funds. The right hon. Gentleman also stated, that subsequently he had received from Mr. Lawley himself a letter, acknowledging that unfortunately he had during that time fallen into the error of speculating in the funds, or entering into some transactions connected with the funds, although he had not availed himself of his official information in any way for the purpose of conducting those speculations. Many hon. Gentlemen near him understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that he had received a letter from Mr. Lawley, at first stating that he had not during the period he held the office of secretary to the Chancellor of the Exchequer speculated in the funds. He wished to know whether that impression was correct? Whether, what Mr. Lawley stated was—that he had not used his official information in speculating in the funds; or was it, that he had not speculated in the funds during the time he was secretary to the Chancellor of the Exchequer?

SIR GEORGE GREY had stated before, that, in consequence of rumours which reached the Duke of Newcastle, which the Duke of Newcastle communicated to him, and which he immediately communicated in writing to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which were that Mr. Lawley had made use of his official knowledge, as private secretary of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to speculate in the funds, on Monday he received a communication, not addressed directly to himself, but a communication which he thought, and had a right to think, was satisfactory and conclusive on these grounds. He certainly understood the purport of that communication to cover the denial of any speculation in the funds during the time Mr. Lawley was private secretary to his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. But, as he had distinctly stated, a reply was required directly to the point, had he made use of his official knowledge for the purpose of speculating in the funds? and he was bound to believe that the denial, whatever the terms, had reference to the charge which was communicated in writing to his right hon. Friend.

MR. DISRAELI: When the conduct of an individual is under discussion, it is not agreeable to interfere, especially after the painful conclusion which has taken place to-day; but there were some observations which fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Recorder of London, differing in some degree from the Secretary of State for the Colonies, with respect to the conduct of my right hon. Friend the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) which I do not think I ought to pass over unnoticed. Those right hon. Gentlemen seem to charge my right hon. Friend with want of straightforwardness and candour, because, after he felt it his duty to give notice that he should bring this subject of the appointment of Mr. Lawley as Governor of South Australia before the consideration of the House, he did not state explicitly what were the grounds upon which he was about to challenge the propriety of that appointment. I think the House will feel, after what it has heard this evening, that my right hon. Friend was placed in a situation of extreme difficulty, and that it was impossible for him definitely and precisely to state what were the charges he had to make against Mr. Lawley, or on what particular grounds he would challenge the propriety of that appointment. I am myself individually aware of the extreme pain which my right hon. Friend felt during the few days which have elapsed with regard to this question. On more than one occasion he did me the honour of consulting me, and certainly the opinion I gave him was not one which at all encouraged him in any precipitate conduct in the affair. My right hon. Friend was actuated by as pure a sense of public duty as would influence any gentleman. I am sure if the letter referred to by the learned Recorder were read to the House, it would show that my right hon. Friend was influenced by feelings of the utmost courtesy and cordiality, and I feel it my duty, after the observations which have been made, to express my own opinion (and I hope and believe it is the opinion of a majority of this House, of Gentlemen on both sides) that the conduct of my right hon. Friend the Member for Droitwich has been perfectly justified by all that has passed.

MR. BRIGHT : I think the House will be disposed to pass from the consideration of a case, certainly the most painful that has occurred since I have had the honour to be a Member of it, and I should not say a syllable with regard to a gentleman who, possibly without intending anything wrong, is placed in a position which must give great pain to himself and his friends. But there is another point involved in this notice which has been very much concealed, or rather pressed out of sight by the urgency of the personal case, and that is the fact of the appointment of a gentleman to an office of high responsibility under circumstances, apart from all private character, which, I think, deserves the attention of the House. I think the right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary partly, if not entirely, admitted that when this appointment was brought under his notice, he himself had some doubt as to the propriety of it, and I think the right hon. Gentleman the Recorder of the City of London said that he heard of the appointment with astonishment. I may say, I believe that feeling of astonishment was almost universal among Members of this House; and if a feeling of astonishment was created here, I should like to ask what must we expect to be the feeling in the Colony over which this appointment was made? I am not one of those who think that colonial appointments of this kind are unimportant; for let the House bear in mind, almost the only tie which connects our Colonies with the mother country is the tie of the colonial government, and probably nothing in the whole colonial system is more important than the appointment of the individuals who in those Colonies shall represent the Crown. My opinion is, that it is indispensable that in appointments of this character you should have, not men who have shown great proficiency at Oxford or great abilities as private secretaries here, but men, if possible, known to the public, whose conduct has been approved before the country, and in whom the Colony itself should have good reason for placing great confidence. Now, in this case it is admitted that this gentleman was almost unknown. There are not a few Members, I will undertake to say, on this side of the House, who actually have no knowledge of his personal appearance. It is admitted that he had been in this House for nearly two years, and taken no part whatever, that I have heard of, in its deliberations; and without saying one single syllable against him, but allowing everything which has been said in his favour, I put it to the House whether it be desirable, having regard to our position in connection with the Colonies, that appointments of men, however excellent or admirable, who are unknown, should be thus made. And I hope what has taken place to-night will have an influence on the Colonial Secretary with regard to other appointments which are before long to be made. I have heard also rumours of appointments which are looming in the not distant future, and although I have no expectation that we shall ever have such another scene as we have had to-night, yet I can quite conceive it possible that vast interests may be jeopardised—I will not say the peace, but the satisfaction and good-will of colonies may be jeopardised—by appointments for which there are no solid foundations. I think the Duke of Newcastle was wrong in the course he took in this particular matter, and that the present Colonial Secretary, out of deference and delicacy to what was done, was not sufficiently alive to the interests of the country and the wants of the Colony, in the appointment of its Governor. With regard to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington), I cannot conceive that any one can say for a moment he has not performed precisely his duty in this matter. The right hon. Gentleman knew what rumours were afloat. He did not want to make a parade of these things, and to bring them unnecessarily before the House. He asked a question which was sufficient to create inquiry in the mind of the Colonial Secretary. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich may have been in hopes that if any of these charges, the rumour of which was confined to himself, were true, that then, without any exposure such as has taken place, the appointment might have been rescinded, and the whole matter terminated without any unpleasant discussion such as has taken place to-night. Therefore the right hon. Gentleman, performing clearly his public duty with that knowledge which had come to him, performed it not only in a manner due to the public service, but also with the greatest possible delicacy towards individuals concerned. For myself, though extremely sorry that this question has come before the House as it has done, I hope it may be a warning to the present Colonial Secretary and his successors that the men to be appointed to these onerous and responsible offices—to be sent to the other side of the globe to represent the Monarch of these realms, and to carry out the behests of the Imperial Parliament—should at least be men to whom no one here can point a finger, and men who can at least deserve, if not obtain, the full confidence of the population they are intended to govern.

MR. ADDERLEY thought that everybody must allow that the appointment of Mr. Lawley was a most unfortunate one, and more especially unfortunate for that gentleman himself, though, after all, he had not been guilty of anything dishonourable. He was known as a young man of very first-rate abilities, and he believed that there was no reflection cast on his honour, the only charge to which he could be held liable being want of discretion in his private station. But he had been sacrificed by a still greater want of discretion on the part of Her Majesty's Ministers in making such an appointment. It seemed, from the statement of the Secretary of the Colonies himself, that he did not approve of it. The hon. Member for Manchester was perfectly justified in saying that this was not an appointment in times like the present for the improvement of our colonies in Australia. The colonies at this moment were very sensitive on these points. They had a suspicion that these appointments were made more with a view to the interests of those at home than to the interests of those who were on the spot, and, at all events, it must be admitted that the appointment of this gentleman had shown that such a suspicion was well founded. It should be borne in mind, too, that this was in sequence of the recent appointment of Mr. Stonor, as Judge in Victoria, which was another of these questionable appointments, and he thought that an appointment of so kindred a character occurring so immediately after was most unfortunate. In both cases the interests of the Colonies were not considered with that deliberation they should have been, and in both cases the unfortunate men had been sacrificed for want of discretion on the part of the Government who made the appointments. By those who thought that the loss of her Colonies would cause England to sink in the scale of nations, any want of discretion on the part of the Government must be considered as a matter of most serious concern. What did the colonists say? They said, "You give us constitutions, you want us to manage our own affairs, and if you want good governors and cannot find them at home we can supply them." The Colonies had furnished such men. Washington, as all knew, was one of the very first men in history. There was one observation used by the right hon. Gentleman the Recorder of London to which he must call attention. That right hon. Gentleman said that, when he heard of this appointment, he gave Mr. Lawley advice, and told him not to exile himself by accepting such an appointment. It might be, certainly, a great condescension on the part of a young gentleman to give up his prospects in this country and become an exile, although a governor in the Colonies; but, if that was the feeling of English gentlemen, the colonists themselves might seek to be raised to such positions of influence and dignity in the administration of their affairs which they best understood, and in which they were most deeply concerned.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I do not think it necessary for me to enter on the personal and more painful part of this subject, except only that as I still feel a warm and affectionate interest in the future of Mr. Lawley, I cannot refrain from tendering my thanks to the House, and to those who have spoken in this debate, for the fair and considerate spirit in which they have approached this question. And I think it only justice to the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir J. Pakington) to tender him my thanks, particularly as I am one who might question the discretion in the exercise he has used of his undoubted right to bring this subject forward, and to say that the speech he has made to-night has entirely convinced me that he is not only governed in these proceedings by a sense of public duty, but that he is sincerely desirous to unite the performance of that duty with every consideration and tenderness towards the gentleman who is the subject of discussion. It is not altogether usual, perhaps, for colleagues to endeavour to do justice to one another in this House, or to offer explanations on one another's behalf, when they are challenged as to the mode in which they exercise their particular functions; but, at the same time, in the intimate relations I have stood to Mr. Lawley—first, as a private connection, and secondly, in my official capacity—and bearing in mind the peculiar circumstances under which my right hon. Friend near me (Sir G. Grey) has become, as he manfully says, responsible for this appointment—I feel that something is due to him, also, from me. But a few weeks have elapsed since my right hon. Friend assumed his present office, having immediately before occupied the position of an independent Member of this House; and I think the House will feel that although my right hon. Friend has challenged that responsibility, yet the greater part of it, in fact, belongs to those who, not ostensibly, were the authors of the appointment; and I am quite certain my noble Friend (the Duke of Newcastle), who recently presided over the Colonial Departments, is the very last man to desire that any one should relieve him of one grain or tittle of any responsibility which attaches to him in the discharge of his official duties. Sir, undoubtedly the origin of that appointment, as I believe, lay in suggestions made to the Duke of Newcastle, not by my hon. Friend (Mr. Lawley), or any of his family, but by those who made the suggestions upon personal knowledge and public grounds, on the distinct conviction the appointment would be one beneficial to the interests of the Colony. I will not conceal the fact that my noble Friend the Duke of Newcastle did not determine to recommend Mr. Lawley for that appointment without reference to me. He naturally looked to me to supply him with information, and to give distinctly an answer to the question, whether in my judgment Mr. Lawley was or was not a fit person for that appointment. Between the Duke of Newcastle and myself the principal part of the responsibility of the appointment is shared—the Duke of Newcastle, in the first instance, being the official author of the proposal, and I being the principal witness to whom he referred.

I cannot consent—(and that is the main reason why I rose)—I cannot consent to leave this question on the footing on which it is placed by my hon. Friend who has just sat down. I agree with him in all he has said with respect to colonial government. I may agree with him, though, perhaps, few will accompany us, that, if it were the desire of the people of South Australia to recommend their own governor, it would be a wise act of the Government of this country to gratify that desire. But when it is said on this occasion, “Why not let the people of South Australia choose a governor themselves,” it is enough for me to point out that the people of South Australia had expressed no such wish, and my belief, I am bound to say, is this, that it is the desire of the people of the Colonies at this moment to receive governors selected, as best they can, by Ministers from among qualified persons known to them in this country. Can it be said that Mr. Lawley's was, on public grounds, a questionable appointment, and discreditable to the Government? My hon. Friend the Member for Manchester says he was totally unknown in this House. I think he said he did not know him by sight. Why was Mr. Lawley unknown to this House? It may be perfectly true he was not well known, for as long as he held the office of private secretary to the Chancellor of the Exchequer it was impossible for Mr. Lawley to acquire that distinction in this House which his abilities and knowledge fairly entitled him to. There was something in the nature of the duties of secretary to the Chancellor of the Exchequer which would prevent an individual from doing justice to himself. My right hon. Friend near me (Sir C. Wood), who has filled the office, and the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli), if he had not left the House, would bear me out when I say that the duties of private secretary to the Chancellor of the Exchequer are not analogous to those of private secretaries to other Ministers, but are in a great degree official and departmental duties. In the anomalous position of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who is placed more outside the Treasury than inside it, and who has important communications with the Board of Inland Revenue, with the Customs, with the Bank of England, with the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, in the discharge of almost all the important functions of his office, he uses his private secretary as the medium, and calls on him to discharge duties more usually discharged by officials in departments. I do not scruple to tell the hon. Member for Manchester that in my judgment, although my friend Mr. Lawley has not had an opportunity of acquiring distinction in this House so as to make himself well known, yet he has done more labour for the public during the last Session and the present, and acquired more experience in public business of an important and difficult character, than falls to the lot of most of those who sit here for, I do not say one or two, but who have sat five, six, or it may be ten, Sessions in this House. That I say on the strength of my own official knowledge. It is very well to say that you ought not to appoint unknown men to be governors of colonies. That is very sound doctrine, but those who call upon the Government to adopt it as an invariable rule should consider what we offer the governor of a colony, and what we have to expect from him. You have to ask that he should expatriate himself, that he should place himself in a society often comparatively rude, in a climate frequently insalubrious, with a great risk of not maintaining his popularity for any lengthened period; and, therefore, almost with the certainty of his term of office being short, and also with the liability of being recalled at any time through the caprice of a Colonial Secretary, without, perhaps, any reason being assigned. With this prospect, I do not hesitate to say the remuneration in most instances is miserably low. Therefore it is vain to come forward, like the hon. Member for Manchester, and say, "It is the duty of the Government to select only well-known men." You may ask well-known men, and they will not go. No man who is well and favourably known in this country will have such an appointment. Those who have had to make these appointments know the extreme difficulty of finding competent persons who will accept them, and the only resource is to fall back upon men not well known, but who, having had some opportunities of estimating their qualifications, you feel assured will hereafter be well known, and fit for the duties which you propose to impose upon them. That is no new doctrine. I should like to know who are the men who are now most distinguished in the government of colonies. There may be rare exceptions in which they were known to the public before their appointment, as in the case of Lord Metcalfe, who was sent out by Lord Derby to Canada. Lord Metcalfe being one of the most heroic and munificent spirits that ever entered the public service—one who disregarded personal advantage, but went straight to the performance of public duty after he had indeed become well known. I shall have to refer to another appointment of Lord Derby in terms of commendation. That appointment of Lord Metcalfe was a happy selection; but I should like to know how many other well-known men were well known when appointed. I need only mention the gentleman who has just been promoted to the governorship of New South Wales—Sir William Denison. Did the hon. Member for Manchester know him by sight? Had he been in this House? Had he ever been in political life? Had he ever discharged any political duties? No, nothing of the sort. He was an able engineer; and I am the person who selected him. [Sir JOHN PAXINGTON: Hear, hear!] I do not know what the right hon. Gentleman means by that cheer, but I think I am justified in referring to the case when it is made a charge against the Government that they have appointed a governor of a colony who was totally inexperienced in public affairs. Sir William Denison was then perfectly inexperienced. He is now well known, honourably known, and has well earned the promotion he has received. That is one case; but in point of fact, that case represents the general rule. But now we are told that no Government ought to appoint anybody but a man of distinguished abilities, and that Mr. Lawley's youth and inexperience unfitted him for this appointment. I will support the appointment of my hon. Friend by reference to an appointment which, I think, no man will question. If the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Adderley) condemns the appointment of Mr. Lawley because he is inexperienced and young, I want to know what he will say to the appointment of Lord Elgin. I refer to Lord Elgin as one of the most distinguished, and one of the most successful of colonial governors, and who has been recently engaged in political negotiations of the most difficult description. What was the age of Lord Elgin when he was appointed? I believe precisely the same age as Mr. Lawley. What was the post to which Lord Elgin was appointed as compared with that of Mr. Lawley's? Mr. Lawley was appointed Governor of South Australia, with a population of 40,000 or 50,000 persons. Lord Elgin was appointed Governor of Jamaica when the Colony was in the agonising struggles which followed emancipation, and with a population of 400,000 or 500,000 persons. Mr. Lawley was appointed after two years' arduous service as secretary to the Chancellor of the Exchequer—after two Sessions in this House. Lord Elgin had been six weeks in this House, during which he had the opportunity of proving his ability by a speech which he made. But it must be recollected that the ability of Mr. Lawley is not called in question; it is only his inexperience in public affairs which is objected to. Lord Elgin had no opportunity of acquiring experience in public affairs. That appointment was made by Lord Derby? Does it reflect discredit on Lord Derby? Does not every one feel that it can only reflect honour upon Lord Derby, and that it supports the proposition that we must look in some degree to the responsibility of the Minister who makes these appointments. It is vain to appoint old men and distinguished men, who have served their time in this House, to posts of such a character as that of colonial governor. My right hon. Friend near me reminds me of another case, almost precisely similar, the appointment of Lord Harris. Is there a name more honoured than the name of Lord Harris? It was my lot to make that appointment, and I remember the circumstances. A gentleman wrote to me on behalf of his son, and speaking of Lord Harris, admitted that he was an amiable Peer, but of infirm health, totally without experience, and unknown. It was true Lord Harris was an amiable man in indifferent health, for he had gone to the West Indies on account of his health, and totally inexperienced; but, from my knowledge of the man, I thought he was qualified to serve his country, and offered him the appointment. He accepted it, and a most efficient servant he made. These are really considerations with respect to the appointment of colonial governors, which I feel bound to lay before the House, as they not only affect the present but every Government, and I am free to say, with the appearances which were before the Duke of Newcastle and my right hon. Friend (Sir G. Grey), that until within the last twenty-four hours I did not repent having borne testimony to them that Mr. Lawley was a qualified man, and in many respects an eminently and admirably qualified man, for this appointment. I again thank the House for the kind manner in which the question has been dealt with, and I earnestly trust that, inasmuch as Mr. Lawley is chargeable only with grave imprudence, and as it does not involve the smallest stain of pecuniary corruption, the door of hope will not be barred against him, and that his future career will not be stopped. I am confident the kindness of this House, and the forbearance and tenderness with which it has approached this question, will be an encouragement to him to repair his error by the sedulous performance of his duty, and that at some future period he will re-establish his character not for honour, but for judgment, which must be the desire, I am sure, of every Member of this House.

Mr. VERNON SMITH agreed in opinion with the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright) and the hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Adderley), that the question of the appointment of colonial governors was one of the most important to which that House could address itself. Totally independent of Mr. Lawley's character was the question whether he was a proper person to appoint at all. He agreed with the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he ought not to be disqualified upon the mere ground of age; but he considered that the fact of his being of so early an age made it a duty incumbent upon those who gave him the appointment to inform themselves thoroughly and especially with respect to steadiness of character. It was in that respect that the utmost investigation was essential, and he thought that it was in reference to this that great blame rested upon those who recommended Mr. Lawley, and not upon his right hon. Friend the present Secretary for the Colonies, although he had so honourably taken the responsibility upon himself. He agreed to some extent with his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to the difficulty of finding good colonial governors, and he thought that the measure of Lord Howick, by which the salaries of those officers had been cut down, was an impolitic and injudicious one, as the qualities required in a colonial governor were rare, and therefore they ought to be adequately paid for; but he also agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for North Staffordshire, that the field was not so limited as had been represented, and that the Colonies themselves contained men whom it might be most proper to appoint.

There could be no objection to the selection of men of known ability, to fill, in the first instance, the appointments of secretaries in the Colonies, and to be afterwards promoted as they might prove themselves deserving, and as opportunity might occur. The circumstances of this very Colony pointed out, in fact, the course which ought to have been pursued, for Sir Henry Young had filled the office of colonial secretary in British Guiana before he had been appointed a colonial governor. He had always understood that there was a rule in the Colonial Office that, instead of sending men long distances upon small stipends, there should be a regular rule of promotion, and that men who had distinguished themselves in the Colonies in subordinate positions should be promoted to superior positions. He thought that the salaries were too small, and that promotion should be substituted for salary; and he felt assured that if that course were adopted there would not be the same difficulty in finding proper governors hereafter. Parliamentary experience in this country might be valuable, but the right hon. Gentleman had deprived himself of this argument in the case of Mr. Lawley, for he had stated that his official duties as secretary of the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been so heavy as to prevent his attendance in Parliament, or gaining Parliamentary experience. He thought the moral to be learnt from all this was, that the appointment of a governor of a colony was a duty involving the most serious responsibility upon those who had to make it, and that Secretaries of State ought therefore to take great pains in investigating both the public and the private character of those who might be recommended to them to go out.

Motion agreed to.

House in Committee of Ways and Means.

SUPPLY—WAYS AND MEANS.

MR. J. WILSON moved the following Resolutions:—

"1. That towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty, the sum of 500,000*l.*, a part of the sum in the Exchequer of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or remaining to be raised on the 5th day of July, 1854, to complete the Aids granted by Parliament for the service of the years 1852 and 1853, be applied to the service of the year 1854.

"2. That, towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty, the sum of 22,322,743*l.* 9*s.* 11*d.* be granted out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

Mr. V. Smith

"3. That, towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty there be issued and applied to the service of the year 1854, the sum of 149,342*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.*, being the Surplus of Ways and Means granted for the service of preceding years."

MR. HUME said, he had collected from the very able speech of the noble Lord the President of the Council, in proposing the Vote of Credit, that of the sum of 3,000,000*l.* intrusted to Her Majesty for the purposes of the war, it was possible that some portion might be applied as a subsidy, and he only rose for the purpose of expressing his opinion, grounded upon experience, that such a course would be imprudent, as it had in former instances proved disastrous. He should be prepared, if it were necessary, to show that subsidies had in every instance counteracted, rather than forwarded, the object for which they had been granted. He deprecated the idea of paying troops belonging to the Sultan, because he believed that if they paid them one month, they would have discontent, and perhaps still more unpleasant consequences, in the next. He trusted that Her Majesty's Government would consider this subject well. He believed that the war was necessary. The House had placed cheerfully at the disposal of the Government all the resources which were necessary for carrying it on with effect, but it had a right to look to them, in return, to apply those resources in the best possible manner, and not to waste a single shilling. He thought that anything like a subsidy would tend to this result, and he rose to enter his caveat against anything of that kind being done without the gravest consideration.

MR. KINNAIRD had not understood the noble Lord to shadow forth anything like a subsidy, but he confessed that, looking at the expense of transport, and at the difficulties of climate with which our troops in the East had to contend, he thought it was an admirable suggestion that we should endeavour to embody the natives of some of the countries in which the war was being carried on, placing over them officers of our own. Far from appearing to him to be at all objectionable, he confessed he should be very much pleased that such an attempt, even on a small scale, should be made, and he trusted that the Government would not be seduced, by what had fallen from his hon. Friend, from, at all events, trying this plan.

MR. HUME said, the returns which he should move for to-morrow, when they were laid upon the table of the House, would prove that in case after case these subsidies had failed in their object; and he protested against any money being paid to any foreign troops while we had our own troops to rely on, since it was on these that the maintenance and vindication of the honour of this country must depend.

LORD DUDLEY STUART concurred with his hon. Friend the Member for Perth (Mr. Kinnaird). They were engaged in a most important war. Did they intend to prosecute it to any efficient purpose? If they did, they must be prepared to make some sacrifices; and he thought that the best, the cheapest, and the most expeditious course they could take would be to take into their pay some of the natives of the countries in which the war was carried on. They all knew that the native troops in India, when officered by British commanders, gave as good an account of the enemy as any men that could be brought into the field, and he believed that no men fought better than the Portuguese, when under British officers, during the last war. He was convinced that some energetic measures must be taken if the present war were to be brought to a satisfactory result. Were we to increase our Army, then, to an enormous extent? He did not think the hon. Member for Montrose would like that. We had already a very large army for this country to have sent abroad, but it was a very small army when compared with those of foreign Powers. If we wanted to increase its numbers, would it not be a good plan to employ the natives, who would make excellent soldiers, and other foreigners who would be at our disposal, and who might be got at an infinitely less cost than must be incurred by an equal augmentation of our own troops?

PUBLIC REVENUE AND CONSOLIDATED FUND CHARGES (No. 2) BILL—MAYNOOTH.

House in Committee.

Clauses agreed to.

Upon Schedule B (schedule of salaries and payments to be provided for by annual Votes or otherwise, as prescribed in Clauses 1 and 7),

MR. SPOONER rose to move the Amendment of which he had given notice; but said that it was not his intention to go into any details on the question of Maynooth, as it was a question he had argued fully before. His views were already well known, but he thought it his duty to take the sense of the Committee on the Amendment of which he had given notice. He would first beg to state that he objected altogether to the grant to Maynooth, and if he did not now go into the subject, it was not because he had in any way altered his opinions. He conscientiously objected to any grant for the education of the people of Ireland, or the education of any of Her Majesty's subjects in the Roman Catholic religion. He objected to it conscientiously, believing it to be a great national sin, and that it was the duty of all the Members in that House to put an end to it. He merely wished to show that his opinions were unchanged and unaltered, and he now objected to leaving the grant to Maynooth as a charge on the Consolidated Fund. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said this was a question of form, but he differed very much from him. It was not a question of form, but a great constitutional one. The alterations in this measure in another place had been so great that the House of Commons could not agree with them, and they were obliged to bring the Bill in again. The question had thus been reopened, and that gave him an opportunity of protesting against the Maynooth grant being taken away from the control of Parliament. Formerly it had been every year subject to the control of Parliament, but in 1845 Sir Robert Peel thought fit to remove it from that control, and fix it on the Consolidated Fund. He had objected to that course at the time, and, consistently with his objection then, he now proposed an Amendment which, if it should be successful, would bring it under the control of Parliament again. The feeling against this grant was daily and hourly increasing, and the majority against it in that House had gone on year by year increasing. It was evident that the Government shrunk from placing it under the control of Parliament, while the country was decidedly against the continuance of the grant. He hoped the practical economists would support his Motion for bringing the practical control of the House to bear upon the expenditure of the country. He called upon the hon. Member for Montrose to support his proposition, as it was in accordance with the opinions he had always expressed with respect to the control that Parliament ought to exercise over that expenditure. If there had been any bargain or contract he would not interpose—if the Vote was in the nature of a pension or reward for services, he would be shy in bringing it under the annual revision of the House. That was not the case here; it was a free gift, granted with the view of conciliating the Roman Catholics, and of putting a stop to the angry discussions in that House. That object had, however, utterly failed; the discussions still continued. The Roman Catholics believed the grant to be their right—they took the money, but it did not conciliate them. They believed that they ought to be the Established Church of Ireland, and they took this money to carry out their own system of education. They did not thank the House for the Vote, and it had not induced them to alter a single opinion. Nothing in the world would satisfy them until they became the supreme Established Church in that country. If hon. Members viewed the question in any other light, they were only blinding and deceiving themselves. If the Government thought they were right in continuing this grant, let them prove their sincerity by bringing it before Parliament annually. The Government might resist the Motion this year or next year, but the Maynooth grant was doomed, its abolition was only a question of time. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving that—

“In case the House shall sanction the principle of removing any charge from the Consolidated Fund now placed upon it by Act of Parliament, to add to Schedule B—the president, vice-president, and students of Maynooth College, and the expenses of the establishment, enacted by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 25.”

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, his hon. Friend had stated at the outset of his speech that he would not enter into this question, but he had been more liberal than he had proposed. [Mr. SPOONER: A quarter of an hour.] He had watched the clock more accurately than his hon. Friend, and he could assure him that his observations had extended—not to too great a length, for the observations of his hon. Friend were always pleasant to listen to—but they had extended to about the length of an ordinary sermon. He would repeat the promise of his hon. Friend to be very brief, and he would endeavour to be more successful in keeping it than his hon. Friend had been. He did not feel it at all necessary to enter into the merits of the question which had been raised as to whether the grant to Maynooth ought to remain on the Consolidated Fund or to be placed in the annual Votes. He had a very decided opinion upon that point; but he thought there were reasons applicable to the Motion of his hon. Friend which were sufficient to govern, and which ought to govern, the decision of that Committee. They ought to recollect their position in reference to this Bill. Nothing could be more important and proper than the legitimate and reasonable vindication of the position of the House of Commons in reference to financial measures in the face of the House of Lords. There could not be a more satisfactory vindication of the privileges of the House as regarded financial measures than the Bill now before it; and when the House of Lords altered any financial Bill, it was most important that the House of Commons, when they agreed in the spirit of those alterations, should send up the Bill again in the same form as they received it. Another reason against the Motion was this—it was a most important question whether the grant to Maynooth should be put into the Estimates or remain on the Consolidated Fund; it was also important that when they discussed that weighty question they should do it in a manner and under circumstances which would show a due respect for the people of Ireland. But what had his hon. Friend done? There were grants from the Consolidated Fund in which other religions were interested. There were grants in which the Church of England was interested, and grants in which the Church of Scotland was interested, and he put it to the House that this question of the Maynooth grant was at least entitled to a serious discussion as a substantive proposition; that it ought to be considered upon general grounds, in connection with the other grants to which he had alluded; or that, at all events, it ought to be considered deliberately, upon a measure distinctly submitted to the House for altering the position in which it was at present placed. It ought not to be dealt with by a by-blow in a financial measure, which had been carefully restricted to its character as a financial measure, and from which the Government in framing it had carefully excluded everything upon which a political question could be raised. He hoped that for these reasons the House would summarily reject the Motion of his hon. Friend; but he must add one word with reference to the opinions and intentions of the Government. He believed it was the opinion of the House that this Bill contained most important and valuable provisions; but he must say, on the part of the Government, that it would be entirely at variance with their convictions of their duty to promote the further progress of this Bill, or its passing into a law, if it were to carry with it, under circumstances so extraordinary, the Vote which his hon. Friend proposed. It was a measure of fiscal reform; they proposed it as a measure of fiscal reform; and as a measure of fiscal reform he hoped the House would pass it. It would be easy for his hon. Friend, if he thought fit, to raise the question of the Maynooth grant, and to take the opinion of the House upon it; but he trusted that this Bill would be allowed to stand upon the ground upon which it had been placed. With these observations, he would commit it to the decision of the House.

MR. DISRAELI: I confess, Sir, I do not agree with many of the sentiments which the right hon. Gentleman has expressed both with regard to this Bill, and with regard to the more important issue that has been somewhat unexpectedly raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Warwickshire. Summary legislation, at this period of the year, may be very desirable, but I am not of opinion that it will prove easy of attainment. I certainly did not intend to discuss the question which my hon. Friend has raised, for I did not know that it would come on to-day. I, however, had placed on the paper certain Amendments to the Bill which the right hon. Gentleman has now brought before us, and it is my fault certainly that I was not present to move them, but the transaction of business at this moment is carried on with such remarkable rapidity, that it is not always possible to vindicate those Resolutions which you wish the House to adopt. The right hon. Gentleman, in the first place, has laid down a principle the justice of which I must question—namely, that when a Bill has passed through the ordeal of the House of Lords similar to the present, all that the House of Commons has to do, is simply to reproduce the Bill which the House of Lords has virtually sanctioned, or vindicate its privileges by the introduction of a new Bill, but to exempt itself from the privilege of moving Amendments upon it. I very much doubt whether the right hon. Gentleman would be able in an argument to substantiate that position. I have placed certain Amendments upon the paper with respect to the Second Consolidated Fund Bill; and I beg the Committee, after what has been said by the right hon. Gentleman, to condescend to look to the nature of those Amendments. As my name has been mentioned in this House, and in another place, with regard to the object of the measure which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has introduced, I beg to state, to prevent any misconception, that this is not a Bill to carry into effect that which the late Government expressed their intention to do. What the late Government intended to do was a very simple, and, I think, a very admirable thing; it was to introduce a Bill which should ensure that the gross revenue of the country should be paid into the Exchequer. We should have proposed that the course of raising that revenue should have become a matter of estimate, and with regard to those charges which formerly, and I believe now, legally press upon the revenue, we should have proposed that some of them should have been placed on the Consolidated Fund, and that the rest should have been brought before the consideration of the House by way of estimate. We did not in any way propose that any charges upon the Consolidated Fund should be transferred to what is now popularly called Schedule B, and become the subject of an annual Vote. It was not at all from the opinion that the charges at present on the Consolidated Fund are not liable, or should not be subject to criticism, for had it been necessary that the charges at present existing on the Consolidated Fund should be subject to Parliamentary criticism, it was our opinion that the best course to have pursued would have been to ask for the institution of a Parliamentary Committee, in order that the whole question of the charges on the Consolidated Fund should have been examined. Now, the fault which I find with the Bill of the Government which has led to the Amendments I have put on the paper is—that, in the first place, it is not a Bill which brings the gross revenue really into the Exchequer. It certainly does provide that there should be an estimate for the cost of the collection, which should be subjected to Parliament, and it also provides that the amount of drawbacks and of bounties—that is, of repayments—should be deducted at the time of collection; but it still leaves a considerable amount of public money, under the name of charges, and so on, to the discretion of the Treasury, and it still leaves the Treasury the power of making considerable payments without the control of Parliament—without the revenue being on the Votes. I think that a great objection, but there is another great objection that I have to this Bill. The reason for taking the course to which I have adverted, and for proposing that Amendment in the preamble, is, that we should have an opportunity of examining the many things that are left out now, that we should state exactly what Parliament means, and what the Government ought to mean—namely, the declaration that it is expedient that the gross revenue of the departments of the Customs, the Inland Revenue, and the Post Office, should be paid into the Exchequer, with the exception of such sums as may be necessary to be retained in order to defray the charges of drawbacks, pensions, and superannuations heretofore charged and paid out of the said branches of the public revenue. Now, the House will observe that the Bill before us has no recital of the kind. If you look at the preamble of the Bill which is in your hands, you would not for a moment guess that that is the object and intention of the Government, for it merely refers to particular charges, divided in a particular manner, and the great object and scope of this financial reform appear to be altogether lost. I have, also, in another clause, or, rather, a proviso added to the clause, proposed that this amount of 4,000,000*l.*, which will now be voted in Parliament as an estimate for the cost of collecting the revenue, should be subject to the same restriction, as far as appropriation is concerned, as the rest of the revenue. I don't think that any hon. Gentleman can doubt the wisdom or the expediency of such a provision. What reason is there that the 4,000,000*l.* which we are now going, for the first time, to vote as the cost of the collection of the revenue—what reason is there that this 4,000,000*l.* should not be subject, as respects the issue, to the provisions of the Act of the 4 & 5 Will. IV., the Act which regulates the charges on the Exchequer, in the same manner as all other sums issued for the public service? I think the Government made a very great omission when they did not introduce a provision to that effect, and I cannot understand why there should be any question of the expediency or the importance of such a provision, or why we are to be estopped from now considering it by any idea that we are acting in a manner contrary to our usual course when a Bill has been thrown out of the House of Commons and a second Bill has been sent from the House of Lords in compliance with their suggestions. There is also on the paper a proposal, on my part, that there should be a clause which would place before Parliament the charges on the Consolidated Fund, and when the right hon. Gentleman first introduced this measure of financial reform, he said that Parliament ought to have a due acquaintance, and, I think he said, control with respect to the charges on the Consolidated Fund; but the right hon. Gentleman has made no preparations in this Bill for that purpose. What I propose is a simple matter, perfectly in unison with all other regulations in regard to the revenue—namely, that the quarterly warrants of the Treasury for certain payments out of the Consolidated Fund should be laid on the table of both Houses of Parliament in ten days after the issue of the last warrant; and, of course, if Parliament be not then sitting, taking the first opportunity of doing so. The three Amendments I propose are—first of all, to carry into effect the purpose, which I believe the House has at heart—namely, that the gross revenue shall really be paid into the Exchequer; secondly, that the 4,000,000*l.*, which we now vote by way of estimate should be subjected to the same restriction as the rest of the revenue of the country; and thirdly, that every three months the House should have, not the power of control, but the power of inspection, as regards the charges on the Consolidated Fund. Those are the three Amendments which I have made, and, in my opinion, it is most important that the House should adopt them, and by adopting them, so far as I can learn, being influenced, in my opinion, by the highest authorities, they will not at all interfere as regards the position of this Bill with the other House of Parliament. Now, I felt it my duty to make these observations on a subject of great interest before us, and, as my name has been mentioned with respect to this measure, both by the right hon. Gentleman on another occasion, and also in another place, I hope it is no great intrusion on my part to have made them. I must now touch on another topic—and, I think, a much more important topic—that has been introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner). The Chancellor of the Exchequer says, he hopes the House will sum marily dispose of this question. I don't say I wish the same; and, with great respect for the right hon. Gentleman, I don't think the tone that he has taken on the subject and the language in which he has expressed himself are at all fitted to the occasion or the subject, and I was surprised that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should have expressed himself in such a manner and adopted such a tone on one of the most important questions which can possibly interest Parliament. I do not know what hon. Gentlemen on either side of the House feel on the subject; but I am of opinion that none of us have been inattentive observers of what has taken place in the present Session of Parliament, and in the Session of Parliament which preceded this, if not on other occasions. Why, Sir, this Motion of the hon. Gentleman is a repeated Motion; it is made for the second time. I gave a silent vote on the previous occasion when it was introduced to our attention; but I will confess I am not prepared to give a silent vote, and to continue to give silent votes on questions of this nature. Why, Sir, we must have all seen that questions of this character have been repeatedly introduced to our notice in the present and the preceding Sessions of Parliament. One day we have had a discussion whether there should be an endowment for Roman Catholic education; then there has been a question raised as to the inspection of conventual establishments; again, there has been a question regarding the Roman Catholic oath—as to what it really means—what is its main purpose and import; that is hardly noticed before we have some other question respecting the establishment of Roman Catholic chaplains in gaols. All these questions are brought forward by what are called independent Members of Parliament; not Members associated in the same particular connection, but sitting on different sides of the House, and influenced generally by different political opinions. Is it possible to be blind to circumstances so strange as these? Is it a wise thing for a Minister of the Crown to get up and treat a question of this kind by saying, "This must be summarily disposed of? It is August—Parliament won't be sitting for six months; the country will have no means, therefore, of expressing its opinion, and we really cannot listen to these questions, which in a thousand forms have already worried and perplexed us." I, Sir, come to quite a different conclusion from that of the right hon. Gentleman. I think these are perplexing questions; they are very serious questions, and I do not think it is at all desirable that we should evade this discussion or endeavour to evade coming to some conclusion on them; I think it a most unfortunate thing that in the first instance, when the hon. Member for Warwickshire made his Motion, from causes which I need not now dwell upon, but which are numerous, the House and the country were baulked of any decision on that question. Now, Sir, what are these various Motions, all of an analogous character? What are they symbolical of? What are the consequences to which they will lead? Surely they are questions not unworthy of the closest attention of statesmen. I think they are significant of this, that the people of this country are dissatisfied with the political status, if I may use such an expression, which our Roman Catholic fellow-subjects occupy with respect to the Protestant constitution of this country. In whatever form the question presents itself I find that at the bottom; and what, I ask, will be the probable consequence of this uneasiness expressing itself in all these various modes of inquiries as to the expediency of the endowment of Roman Catholic colleges, of the inspection of Roman Catholic convents, of the interpretation of Roman Catholic oaths, or of the establishment of Roman Catholic chaplains? What must be the necessary consequence of such questions being left in perpetual controversy without any one coming forward with authority to lead or to inform public opinion on the subject? What must be the consequence? It denotes, in my mind, internal dissensions, perhaps violence and disorder, and as I sincerely believe, great injury to the principles of civil and religious liberty. Well, Sir, I confess, as this question is brought before us in a summary way, and, as we are told, in a manner which does not at all take away from its importance, I think we are bound, particularly as it has been so often repeated, finally to meet it. I don't want at all to dwell on my individual feelings on this subject. I am rather placing the question on broader considerations, and I will not say in vindication, but in explanation of my vote with respect to the Motion of the hon. Gentleman which I gave some weeks ago, and which I shall give to-night, that it is the same I gave originally on the Motion of Sir R. Peel, with regard to the endowment of Maynooth. I shall not go into the reasons which influenced me then, and which influence me now, on the subject, not wishing to introduce individual feelings into the question; but what I want to press on the House is, that it cannot be permitted—it cannot be tolerated with any regard to the public safety—that Session after Session, an important question with respect to the relations, I may say, which exist between our Roman Catholic fellow-subjects and the Protestant constitution of this country should be left in doubt, matter of public controversy, so that every Member of Parliament, whatever may be his general political opinions, may rise and excite the public mind, interrupting by such discussions the whole course of public business. I think this question has come to such a pass that it is the duty of the Government to come forward to meet and solve this difficulty, and so to determine this controversy which breaks out in so many forms and from so many sides. Have we or have we not a Protestant constitution? If we have a Protestant constitution, what does it mean? Let Government come forward—let it declare by legislation what are the functions, what the attributes, what the influence, and what is the bearing of that Protestant constitution. Let every man, whether he be a Protestant or a Roman Catholic, clearly understand what are the rights and privileges which he enjoys under that constitution—what he may do and what he may not do. I think that this is a question which ought to be solved, that these are matters which do demand the consideration of statesmen, which ought to be met without reserve, and settled in a manner which shall satisfy the public mind—I say, without the slightest reserve, for I know no public man of the times in which we live, who I think is placed, and has been placed, in a more happy position to attempt the solution of this question than the noble Lord the Lord President of the Council. The noble Lord has associated his name through a long career with his successful labours in favour of religious liberty; he is, therefore, entitled, and justly entitled to, and I believe he possesses the confidence of a large body of his countrymen, who look up to him with respect and reverence. The noble Lord is an eminent Member of a party which half a century ago offered him power in order to secure the political privileges of their Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen, and that is a claim to the confidence of the Roman Catholics of this country which may be forgotten in moments of passion, but which, on the whole, I think, must last in the grateful feelings of a nation. Well then, if the noble Lord, both as regards the question of religious liberty and as regards the question of the political franchise of the Roman Catholics, can come forward on a matter of this imperial importance, with circumstances of great advantage, when he addresses the public mind and attempts to lead it to a result which he desires, it cannot be forgotten that the noble Lord is the individual who, when he was Prime Minister of this country, felt it to be his duty, in the name of his Sovereign, in the Parliament of England, to denounce the Ultramontane conspiracy against the liberties of Europe. The noble Lord has never for a moment shrunk, and I am sure never will shrink, from that most solemn expression of his, which, during the existence of the present Government, in conjunction with a similar expression of his opinion, led to such a misconception and misunderstanding, that some of the subordinate Members of the Government even resigned their posts, were only induced to return to their position by an assurance from the First Minister of the Crown that the Protestant opinions of the noble Lord were not shared by his colleagues. I only refer to that to show that the noble Lord has on this subject been influenced by strong predilections, and I think it is due from the noble Lord to come forward—not now—not in a summary manner, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer says, but after due reflection and study of this question—after examining it in all its bearings and during the recess—I think it is the duty of the noble Lord, and the duty of the existing Government, that they should come forward and lay down some principle of regulation which shall precisely define the rights and privileges of Her Majesty's subjects, whether they are Protestants or whether they are members of the Roman Catholic Church, and that it should not become a subject of controversy every night almost of the Session whether the Roman Catholics should enjoy the privilege of conventual establishments, whether colleges should be endowed by the State in order to educate the priesthood who are not the priesthood of the State, whether there is any meaning in the oath that is taken by Roman Catholic Members, or whether all these regulations with respect to our prisons or other establishments involve or do not involve a breach of the Protestant constitution of the country? Sir, I hold that—and I know not whether I agree with the opinions on this side of the House or that—in saying you are prepared to maintain the Protestant constitution of this country, you are advocating the rights and privileges of the Roman Catholic subjects of Her Majesty as well as her Protestant subjects. I look upon the Protestant constitution to be the guarantee of the civil and religious liberty of the people of this country, and because I am of this opinion, I feel that if the Government neglect their duty, and if these fragmentary parts of the question are, under its various shapes and aspects, brought under public discussion and Parliamentary debate, the result will be a heavy blow and great discouragement to civil and religious liberty. It is because I see the danger ahead, and because we cannot avoid it, that I call upon the Government, not in haste, or prematurely—not in a “summary manner”—not to tell us in August what they will do, but I call upon the noble Lord, in whom I have great confidence, upon this question to come forward and say, on the part of the Administration, that he will at the earliest period, notwithstanding the smiles and whispers of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, come forward on the part of the Government and propose a measure that will be satisfactory to the public mind, and attempt to solve these difficulties, and not leave any gentleman to agitate the public mind on questions of this importance, but that he will be prepared on the part of the Government to bring forward such measures as will vindicate the Protestant constitution, and prove that the enduring existence of that constitution is not only consistent with civil and religious liberty, but is the only security also, and the guarantee, that we have for these unspeakable blessings.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I confess I was certainly somewhat alarmed until the right hon. Gentleman arrived towards the end of his speech, because, until the right hon. Gentleman said that this was not a question to be considered in the month of August, I thought he proposed that in the month of August the Government should introduce a Bill to define the whole bearings of the Protestant constitution, how far Roman Catholic endowments were compatible with, and how far the payment of

Roman Catholic chaplains might be reconciled with that constitution, how far, in all respects, the limits of this Protestant constitution might be extended, and how far it might be reconciled with the general principles of civil and religious liberty. That was the task which I thought the right hon. Gentleman was about to enforce upon the Government at the beginning of August. But I rejoiced to find that the right hon. Gentleman gives us some months of respite before that task is to be performed. I cannot promise the right hon. Gentleman, nor can I hold out a prospect, that so gigantic a task will be undertaken by the Government. At all events, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Spooner), who brought forward this discussion, proposed a different course, because his proposal was that the Vote to Maynooth should be an annual Vote, in order that he may have the opportunity of making a speech annually upon Maynooth, and that after ten years of agitation the question may be brought to a conclusion. But if he were triumphant in this proposal, and if he were the slayer of Maynooth, we should still have those other questions of the Roman Catholic chaplains and the Protestant constitution unsettled. I must remind the right hon. Gentleman that I have not had great encouragement this Session to undertake questions of this kind, because, with regard to one of them, I proposed that we should have civil equality among Members of this House, and that when hon. Members came to the table we should not inquire into their religious opinions and persuasions, and that we should all take one civil oath. I found a very strong opponent in the right hon. Gentleman, and it discouraged me so much that I am not disposed to bring in a code beginning with the rights of man, and ending with the privileges and limits of each religious persuasion, defining the bearing of the constitution on each of the different sects. I own that the discouragement that I have received from the right hon. Gentleman will prevent me from bringing in any such measure.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that Parliament had placed the property of the University of Oxford in a Commission, and it would in that form come under the consideration of Parliament, and what was claimed with regard to Maynooth was, that, as in the case of Oxford, Parliament had based its proceedings on the Report of a Commission, and as a Commission had been issued to inquire into Maynooth, the House of Commons should, preparatory to the Report of that Commission, place the Vote to Maynooth upon the footing of an annual payment within the command of Parliament, so that the whole subject might be fairly considered when the Report of the Commission was in the hands of hon. Members next Session. It was quite certain that the public would have an investigation into the education given at Maynooth and its tendency, and they would consider the opposition to the present Motion as an attempt to evade that which could not long be successfully evaded.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 43; Noes 108: Majority 65.

MR. DISRAELI said, that his proviso to be added to Clause I would now stand as a separate clause. It was as follows—

"That all Sums voted for the charges and payments set forth in Schedule B shall be subject, as respects their issues, to the provisions of the Act of 4 & 5 Will. IV. c. 15, intituled 'An Act to regulate the Office of the Receipt of the Exchequer at Westminster,' in the same manner as all other Sums voted for any specified branch of the Public Service."

The object of the clause was, that all sums brought into the Exchequer under this new Act should be subject to the same restrictions as regarded appropriation as the rest of the revenue, and he therefore could not understand that there could be any objection to the clause.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was quite impossible that he could accede to any part of any one of the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman, and he was only surprised that he should have made them. He did not know whether the person who had drawn the present clause for the right hon. Gentleman had accurately fulfilled the intentions he was supposed to entertain, but the clause was entirely and absolutely useless. It would produce no legislative effect, except an effect which was already secured by the present law, because the present law provided, in terms most explicit, that all sums of money voted by that House must uniformly go through the forms of the Exchequer issue and payment. The object with which the clause was drawn seemed to him one of which the right hon. Gentleman was probably not aware. It was to create a new Parliamentary title for the present Exchequer system, the utility of which was, to his mind, somewhat less than doubtful. He had not yet been enabled to discover any useful purpose that the Amendment would serve, but it would be very easy to show much mischief that it would do. The effect of the clause would be a new recognition by Parliament of the propriety of adopting provisions with regard to money which now passed through the Exchequer, and he hoped the House would not be induced to frame a system in respect of which it was more than doubtful whether it would be beneficial for the public service or not. He protested against any new recognition of the principles upon which repayment of money into the Exchequer now rested.

MR. DISRAELI said, the right hon. Gentleman never gave him credit either for drawing clauses or anything else; but he gave the right hon. Gentleman credit for being too clever by half. The clause of the 4 & 5 Will. IV. had been submitted to men of good reputation as lawyers, who had very grave doubts whether its provisions would apply to the 4,000,000*l.* which had been referred to. He had, therefore, proposed a new clause, in order to bring this 4,000,000*l.* under the same restrictions as the rest of the revenue. He granted that it might not be necessary, but every one would agree that it was a surplusage in the right direction. In his opinion, in order to have the same restrictions upon the appropriation of the 4,000,000*l.* which were placed upon the rest of the revenue, it was necessary that they should have the clause he proposed.

MR. HUME opposed the Amendment, and thought the regulations ought to remain as they were at present until the whole subject could be considered and decided upon. He thought the time had arrived for dealing with the question of bringing the whole gross revenue under the eye of Parliament.

MR. DISRAELI saw no reason why, because it was desirable to have a full and ample inquiry, that he should be supposed to agree in crude measures. It was for the Committee to decide whether this sum of 4,000,000*l.* of new Estimates, now brought for the first time under the control of Parliament, should be subjected to the same restrictions as the rest of the revenue with regard to its issue and appropriation. If the financial reformers were not disposed to support him in this he should not press his proposal to a division.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER reminded the House that the existing law contained words to the effect that any new sums of money granted hereafter should pass through the same channel as the rest of the revenue.

MR. BOWYER thought it satisfactory that the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire had called the attention of the House to the importance of the gross revenue of the country passing through the Exchequer. It was said that there was 5,000,000*l.* or 6,000,000*l.* of money which never found its way into the Exchequer at all, but which was disposed of by different departments without being ever voted by Parliament. He thought the system of auditing the public accounts required reconsideration, with a view to the reconstruction of that branch of the public service.

Clause negatived.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY proposed the addition of a clause, to the effect that nothing in the Act contained should have the effect of facilitating any changes in the existing establishments of any of the superior courts of law in Ireland, without a certificate from the Judges to the Treasury having first set forth the circumstances rendering such changes necessary. If the clause was not carried, he should give notice of Amendments to place the English courts on the same footing as the Irish courts. He should also move to put in the English Court of Chancery, which was entirely omitted in the Act, but he trusted his clause would be so received as to render his Amendments unnecessary.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER would not complain that the hon. Gentleman had brought forward this clause without notice, because he felt it was desirable that all Amendments should be brought forward now rather than on the third reading. It was, however, impossible for him to agree with this clause. The purpose of the clause referred to by the hon. Gentleman was to impose restrictions upon an increase of salaries. The purpose of the clause, as proposed by the hon. Gentleman, was to fetter the discretion of Parliament, whether in the increase or in the diminution of salaries. The only argument used by the hon. Gentleman which was of any weight was, that the Bill, as it at present stood, dealt unequally with the English and the Irish courts. The fact, however, was, that owing to the difference of circumstances, it was necessary to create a nominal inequality in order to do substantial justice. In Ireland they had proceeded further in the abolition of fees than they had done in England; and, therefore, the clause was accommodated to that altered state of things. When the fees in the English courts were dealt with in the same manner as the fees in the Irish courts, they would be put upon the same footing also with regard to this Bill.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, that he did not mean to increase, but to diminish, the charges, and his clause would have no other effect.

Clause negatived.

MR. DISRAELI proposed the clause of which he had given notice—

“Copies of each of the Quarterly Warrants of the Treasury, issued under the Act 57 Geo. III. c. 84, and the 4 & 5 Will. IV. c. 15, to the Controller General of the Receipt and Issue of Her Majesty's Exchequer, shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament within ten days after such Warrants shall be issued, if Parliament shall then be sitting, otherwise within ten days after the commencement of the next Session, together with a Copy or statement of the disbursements actually made in virtue of the Treasury Warrant during the antecedent quarter.”

When the Chancellor of the Exchequer introduced this measure he impressed the importance of a periodical inspection or supervision, on the part of the House of Commons, with regard to the charges on the Consolidated Fund. That was a feature of this measure of financial reform. Now, the Committee would observe that in the Bill before them there was no provision at all to effect this object. The object of the clause he proposed was, that quarterly warrants of the Treasury should be laid upon the table of the House, so that they might know every three months what were the charges on the Consolidated Fund. This was the only mode he could see by which they could attain the object in view, and he was sure the House of Commons must wish to exercise the power and the supervision to which he had alluded.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was a very invidious task to oppose proposals of this kind, but he must say he entirely objected to this proposal. Before he proceeded further, however, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman under what section or sections of the Acts of the 57 Geo. III. and the 4 & 5 Will. IV. he referred when he spoke of these quarterly warrants as being issued under these Acts?

MR. DISRAELI said, he had not those Acts then by him.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Here they are, at the service of the right hon. Gentleman. I took care to have them at hand for him; for I am rather curious to learn under what sections the right hon. Gentleman finds the authority for the issue of those warrants.

MR. G. A. HAMILTON asked, whether it was not the fact that these warrants were issued under the authority of those Acts of Parliament?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER declined to be the interpreter of the law as stated by others, but wished to know the authority for the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that these quarterly warrants were issued under the Acts in question?

MR. DISRAELI referred to the 12th section of the 4 & 5 Will. IV.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER would assure the right hon. Gentleman that he was entirely misinformed as to the application of the Act. The section quoted by the right hon. Gentleman referred to ordinary Treasury warrants, which in every case were required before an issue of money could take place. But these quarterly Treasury warrants which the right hon. Gentleman said were issued under the Act 4 & 5 Will. IV. were warrants of an entirely different description, and did not, in point of fact, cause the issue of any money whatever. He therefore again asked the right hon. Gentleman under what portion of the Act referred to so authoritatively by him it was that he considered these quarterly warrants of the Treasury were either authorised or required? As at present informed, he demurred altogether to the recital of the right hon. Gentleman that these quarterly Treasury warrants were issued under the authority of these Acts. His opinion was, that these warrants were not required by the law. They were certainly issued in principle; and he would go further, and admit that the form of the warrants and the words of the warrants might certainly be construed in favour of the position that they were issued under the authority of the law; but he knew of no ground for stating that they were either required or authorised by the law. What he said was this—that these were documents of a description the most complex, the most antiquated, the most absurd, the most calculated to maintain deception and mystification in matters of public accounts that this House could possibly conceive;

and he did not hesitate to state—whether it were the object of this clause or not to do so he did not know, but its effect would be to give a legal sanction and authority to these Treasury warrants, which, in his judgment, at the present moment, they did not possess.

MR. DISRAELI would withdraw his clause, as it was wrong in point of form; but this he clearly saw, from every observation which fell from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the right hon. Gentleman was determined to put an end to the restriction which at present existed as to the issue of public money from the Exchequer, which restriction he believed to be of the greatest importance, and which he applied to these 4,000,000*l.* of new revenue which was to be brought under the control of the Exchequer. Of course, it was useless to attempt to come to any decision now upon any particular point, but he begged the Committee to bear this in mind—that the principles of the right hon. Gentleman would render it impossible for him to go on for another year without bringing forward some Bill, the object of which would be to diminish the restriction upon the issue of public money which at present existed.

Clause negatived.

MR. DISRAELI had now to allude to another point of great importance. They were all agreed that the object of the great change which, he might observe, he had had the honour of first bringing forward, was, that the gross revenue of the country should be brought into the Exchequer. The fault he found with this Bill was, that it evaded this great object. It certainly brought into the annual statement of public accounts a large amount which hitherto had not found its way there, but it still left a great portion of the public revenue under the name of charges, pensions, and superannuations, at the disposition of the Treasury, free from the control and cognisance of Parliament, and which amount of public money was still under the immediate control of the Treasury alone. Now, he proposed that the preamble of this Bill should express the meaning of Parliament upon this subject, and therefore he had placed upon the paper a preamble which should state that—

“It is expedient that the gross revenue of the Departments of Customs, Inland Revenue, and Post Office should be paid into the Exchequer, with the exception of such sums as may be necessary to be retained in order to defray the charges of drawbacks, repayments, pensions, and superannuations heretofore charged upon and paid out of the said branches of the public revenue."

Now, this was a simple and clear declaration. He proposed to have a public expression of the opinion of Parliament on the subject. He wanted, and he understood the House of Commons wanted, that the gross revenue of the Departments of Customs, Inland Revenue, and Post-office should be paid into the Exchequer. He had been informed since he entered the House that the preamble of the Bill was couched, if not in identical, in similar language to his own. He begged the Committee would observe the remarkable difference between the language in the preamble of the Bill of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and that he had proposed. The preamble of the Bill said—

"And whereas it is expedient, in order to bring the gross income and expenditure of the United Kingdom and the Isle of Man under the more immediate view and control of Parliament."

Now, he said, that the object of the House of Commons was not that the gross income and expenditure of the United Kingdom should be brought "under the more immediate view and control of Parliament;" their object was that the gross national income should be brought into the Exchequer. Such words as "the more immediate view and control of Parliament," might bring a large amount of that revenue under their control, but it would leave a very large portion beyond their control. The words which the Committee ought to adopt were the simple and plain words, that they would bring the gross income of the country into Her Majesty's Exchequer. The words in the preamble of the Bill of the Chancellor of the Exchequer were so essentially evasive and equivocal that you might really draw almost any meaning you pleased from them, and he thought it would be much better to adopt the plain, straightforward language he had placed on the paper. He, therefore, begged to propose the alteration in the preamble of which he had given notice.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he felt bound to take the same course with this as with the right hon. Gentleman's previous Amendment. There were two important points, which, so far as a declaration of law was concerned, were raised by this Amendment. The preamble which the right hon. Gentleman proposed enunciated the principle that pensions and superannuations upon the revenue departments—that was to say, the great bulk of all the pensions and superannuations paid throughout the kingdom—something like five-sixths of the whole amount—should not be brought under the control of Parliament. Now, he demurred altogether to that object of the right hon. Gentleman, and he thought the right hon. Gentleman ought to have stated it, and to have made the House acquainted with the omissions which were included in his Amendment. In stating what he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not before aware of, that the right hon. Gentleman was the first to bring forward a change like that now proposed, the right hon. Gentleman should have declared that his object was to remove from the control of Parliament pensions and superannuations chargeable upon the revenue departments, and which amounted, he believed, to something like 500,000*l.* or 700,000*l.* a year. On this ground he objected to the preamble of the right hon. Gentleman. The Committee of the House of Lords had made in this Bill a most injudicious change, founded upon most insufficient grounds, for they reported that they had not sufficient information before them in order to enable them to determine whether it was proper that these pensions and superannuations should remain upon the gross revenue, or whether they should be voted in the Estimates; and, instead of sending to the Treasury for the information they required, they struck out of the Bill these clauses altogether. Now, he must say, that unless his anxiety had been so great to carry out what remained of this Bill, nothing would have induced him to acquiesce in such a change introduced into a money Bill, not by the House of Lords, but by a Committee of the House of Lords. This change certainly left the Bill incomplete. These pensions and superannuations would be left chargeable on the gross revenue. On another occasion it would be necessary to attempt to make clearer work upon this point, but the preamble of the right hon. Gentleman would tie the House, as a matter of principle, to that which the House of Lords had forced upon them as a matter of fact. But another point was involved in the preamble of the right hon. Gentleman. When this Act was introduced it was met by this objection on the part of those who wished to adhere to, the present system. Those persons always said it would be most inconvenient to have all the money received at the various outports sent up to London, and then to send back again that part of it which was necessary for the maintenance of the establishments at those outports. Thus, at Liverpool, something like 70,000*l.* was required to pay the charges of the establishments there, and this amount, it was said, would be most irrational to send up to London from Liverpool and then back again. Now, nobody had ever said it was rational to do so. All they wanted was the control of Parliament over this money. That being settled, they left the money received at the outports to be dealt with in the most economical manner in which it could be dealt with. It might be paid where it was received, but it would have to be accounted for, and a balance struck between the local and the central fund. That was the principle on which his Bill was framed. Lord Monteagle, who had always been a steady opponent of this change, had stated before a Commission, which was appointed to investigate the subject, this very objection, and urged the absurdity and expense of sending more work forward in this way. It was to avoid this absurdity and expense that he had framed the Bill in the way he had done. The inconvenience of the plan objected to by the noble Lord would be very great, and nobody—he was going to say—was foolish enough to propose it; but as the right hon. Gentleman had now proposed that very plan, he must withdraw the word “foolish,” though he hoped the House would not adopt the Amendment.

Motion negatived.

MR. BOWYER said, he had seen a report published by some persons who were anxious for a reform in the Customs in which credit was given to the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposing to transfer the whole gross revenue of the country to the Exchequer which formerly has not been so paid into the public Treasury. The Commissioners of Public Accounts, in 1831, laid it down as a principle that the whole of the public revenue ought to be paid into the Exchequer, and then paid out of the Exchequer for the public service. No doubt there might be particular instances where it might be convenient that small local payments should be made on the spot; but the general principle ought to be that the whole of the receipts should be paid into the Exchequer. It would be satisfactory to know whether it was intended that this should be the case.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER thought he had already explained

in distinct terms that the expense of collection was to be defrayed at the ports, leaving the balance to be settled as a matter of account, while the authority of Parliament was applied to the expenditure through the machinery of the Votes.

MR. HUME suggested that every accountant, and every other person who had any public money in his possession, should render his accounts regularly, in order that they might be settled. If this had been done, the country would not have lost so much by Mr. Swaby. He ought also to be called upon to give security, and that the securities ought to be revised from time to time. He submitted that it was the duty of the Government to have all public charges, whether fees, prize-money, or other payments, brought into the Exchequer.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was not surprised to hear his hon. Friend advert to this subject, and in reference to which he hoped the Committee would bear in mind that that case was one of the consequences of the mode of dealing with public money which had been fashionable in past years—that of disposing of it either by placing the charge upon the Consolidated Fund, or by some permanent Act of Parliament which effectually removed it from the control of the House of Commons. That was a lesson which he hoped would not be forgotten. It also illustrated another dangerous practice which the House ought to correct—that of entrusting the management of public money to persons who were appointed for other purposes. It was not fair to cause large sums of money to be held under the responsibility of the Judges of courts of law. Their duty was to administer the law—a duty difficult enough for any man; and they ought not in any way to be responsible for the control and management of public money. With regard to the immediate question, the case did not admit of being dealt with upon a general rule. In some instances the amounts were too large to be dealt with by way of security, and other modes must be adopted; but certainly he thought there ought to be some review of the securities under which public money was held.

MEDICAL GRADUATES (SCOTLAND AND IRELAND) BILL—ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question

[22nd July], "That the Bill be now read the third time;" and which Amendment was to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he hoped the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had charge of this Bill (Colonel Dunne), considering the late period of the Session and the nature of the measure itself, would allow it to drop. Her Majesty's Government intended to take up the general question at the commencement of the next Session, when he thought either a Commission or a Committee ought to be appointed, consisting in either case of gentlemen not belonging to the medical profession; and on the result of their inquiries some general measure might be framed, satisfactory to the wants of the profession and the interests of the community at large. The House, therefore, would agree with him that it would be scarcely advisable to lose time in discussing a Bill which had no chance of passing this Session.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he had, of course, at this period of the Session, no alternative but to comply with the request of the noble Lord. He was glad to hear that the Government meant to take up the subject, for he felt sure that if it were left to medical men it would be a long time before it was settled. His (Colonel Dunne's) object was to place the Irish and Scotch Universities on the same footing, with respect to medical degrees, as the University of London.

Question put, and negatived; Words added; Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to.

Bill put off for three months.

MR. WALPOLE entreated the noble Lord the Home Secretary not to consider the passing of the Medical Graduates (University of London) Bill as a pledge on the part of Parliament, that in considering the question the University of London was to have the power of conferring degrees with the consequential licence that followed from those degrees. That question was left open.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON considered the object of the Bill referred to was simply to place the degrees of the University of London upon the same footing as those of Oxford and Cambridge. Parliament distinctly understood that the whole question was left open.

EPISCOPAL AND CAPITULAR ESTATES MANAGEMENT BILL.

MR. EVELYN DENISON moved the addition of the following clause—

"That in all dealings between the Church Estate Committee acting in behalf of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England, as to lands now vested or which shall hereafter become vested in the said Ecclesiastical Commissioners and the holders of such lands, the said Church Estate Committee shall pay due regard to the just and reasonable claims of such holders of land under lease or otherwise arising from the long-continued practice of renewal, and in every case where a treaty has been entered into between the said Church Estate Committee and the said holders of land, it shall be lawful on the application of either of the said parties to such treaty to the other of them, to refer to arbitration the finding of the annual value and of the value of the fee simple thereof, subject to the exceptions and reservations, if any, to be excepted and reserved thereout, and such finding shall be adopted in computing the terms of the sale, purchase, or exchange of such lands, or of any interest therein, and the said last-mentioned parties shall for the purpose of such arbitration, be subject to the provisions hereinbefore contained as to the appointment of arbitrators and the payment of costs. That the provision in the hereinbefore recited Act as to information being required respecting the proceedings under it, shall extend and be held to apply to all proceedings respecting land vested, or which may become vested in the said Ecclesiastical Commissioners."

The object of this was, that all ecclesiastical property, whether held by bishops and chapters, or by the Commissioners, might be brought under the same management. It had been supposed by the House that a clause to this effect was in the former Act; but the Commissioners had held that it did not apply to the property which they held. A further object of the clause was to give the power of arbitration to the Commissioners in certain cases.

Clause brought up, and read 1^o.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be now read a second time."

MR. GOULBURN opposed the clause, which he said was irrelevant to the object of the present Bill, and should have formed the subject of a separate enactment. The hon. Member who proposed the clause seemed to assume that it went no further than the one which had been proposed by the hon. Member for Shields (Mr. Ingham). That, however, was not so. For this clause made arbitration compulsory at the will of either party, and would apply not only to lands held by Church lessees, but also to those which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners held at rack rent. If it were agreed to, every one of their tenants might claim to have their lands valued and enfranchised. The question of arbitration, as proposed in this clause, was a compulsory dealing with property, which every person said should be voluntarily dealt with.

MR. MULLINGS did not read it as a compulsory clause, but at all events the words could be altered to prevent such a construction being put upon them as had been suggested by the right hon. Gentleman. He hoped that the noble Lord the President of the Council would sanction the clause, and he would take care, before the third reading, words should be introduced to make the arbitration permissive.

MR. INGHAM supported the clause, and did not consider that the objections urged by the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for the University of Cambridge, were well founded.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that the clause was one to which he could not ask the House to assent. He did not know whether, if it were agreed to, it would act harmoniously with other Acts upon the same subject, but he objected to the practice of taking occasion, when a Bill was introduced upon one subject, to introduce a clause that had reference to quite a distinct subject. It was not fit that they should introduce in the Bill a rule with regard to the Ecclesiastical Commission more stringent than that which was applied to the Church Estate Commission. He would, therefore, ask the hon. Member for Malton to postpone his clause until the subject of the Ecclesiastical Commission came properly before the House.

MR. J. A. SMITH supported the clause, and trusted his hon. Friend would press it to a division, as he would rather see the Bill lost than that the clause should be rejected.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL opposed the clause, on the ground that it gave too large a power to the lessees and was a departure from the intention of the Bill, which had worked beneficially hitherto, but which he considered it would be unwise to extend to the whole of the property under the management of the Church Estate Commission.

Mr. Goulburn

Question put, and negatived.
Amendment made; Bill to be read a third time to-morrow.

CUSTOMS ACTS.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

MR. J. WILSON moved the following Resolutions—

"That from and after the 1st day of August, the Duties of Customs chargeable on the Goods, Wares, and Merchandise, hereafter mentioned, imported into the United Kingdom, shall cease and determine, viz., Sulphate of Potash.

"That from and after the 1st day of August, in lieu of the Duties of Customs now chargeable on the articles under-mentioned, imported into the United Kingdom, the following duties of Customs shall be charged, viz.: Arms, Swords, Cutlasses, Matchets, Bayonets, Gun Locks, Cannon, or Mortars of Iron, not mounted nor accompanied with carriages, 2s. 6d. the cwt.; Cannon or Mortars of brass, not mounted nor accompanied with carriages, 10s. the cwt.; Cannon or Mortars, mounted or accompanied with carriages and other fire arms, viz., Muskets, Rifles, Carbines, Fowling pieces, or Guns of any other sorts not enumerated, and Pistols, for every 100*l*. value thereof, 10*l*. Ammunition, &c. namely, Shot, large and small, of lead, 2s. the cwt.; of Iron, 2s. 6d. the cwt. Rockets, and other combustibles for purposes of war, and not otherwise enumerated or described, for every 100*l*. value thereof, 10*l*. Hops, until the 1st August, 1855, 1*l*. the cwt.; from and after that date, 2*l*. 5s. Iron and Steel, wrought or manufactured, except Arms and Ammunition, viz., Machinery, Wrought Castings, Tools, Cutlery, and other manufactures of iron or steel, not enumerated, 2s. 6d. the cwt.; Fancy ornamental articles of iron and steel, 15s. the cwt."

MR. FREWEN asked upon what principle the proposed hop duty of 1*l*. per cent until the 1st of August, 1855, and 2*l*. 5s. per cent after that date had been framed?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that there had been reason to anticipate a great scarcity and high price of hops. This would have an injurious effect upon those interested in the growth and sale of barley, as well as upon the consumption of malt, and the large revenue which depended upon that consumption. A scarcity being anticipated, Parliament had been invited to do that which in cases of scarcity it generally did, sometimes by immediate reference to the House, and sometimes by the discretion of the Government, with the subsequent approval of Parliament, to remit for a time a portion of the duty, in order to facilitate in times of exigency the supply of a necessary article to the consumer. He had seen three Gentlemen representing the county of Kent upon this subject, and at that period the proposition was, that the duty should be reduced until the 1st of November, 1855. They represented, however, that that would be going beyond the occasion, and he had yielded to their representations, and had altered the date to the 1st of August, 1855, so as, he thought, completely to remove their objections. He believed that those Gentlemen were satisfied with the alteration.

Mr. FREWEN said that, some years ago, the Customs duty upon hops had been 12*l.* 10*s.* per cent. It had then been reduced to 8*l.* 11*s.*, then to 4*l.* 10*s.*, and it now stood at 2*l.* 5*s.* The Excise duty, during the same periods, had remained the same, and he believed that it was the only tax which had been never either mitigated or repealed since 1805. In 1834 the appearance of the hops was much worse than at present; and, although it was expected that not more than 3 cwt. or 4 cwt. an acre would be produced in Sussex, some of the plantations there had produced more than a ton an acre. There was always much speculation as to what the duty on hops would be, and at that period the old duty had been put down at less than 60,000*l.*, whereas it produced nearly 190,000*l.*, and the old and new duty together produced 329,941*l.* He disapproved of the lowering of the Customs' duty, unless the Government agreed to a corresponding lowering of the Excise duty to four-ninths of its present amount. A reduction of the duty on foreign hops would be unjust towards the English planter, unless accompanied by such a reduction. From information he had received from the hop plantations in all parts of the kingdom, and from the great improvement which had taken place during the last ten days, he believed that the crop would turn out very different from what had been expected a fortnight ago. He had not brought forward his usual Motion for a repeal of the excise duty on hops this year, in consequence of the war, but his opinion with respect to it remained unchanged. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving that hops be omitted from the Resolution.

Mr. DEEDES denied that he had expressed himself satisfied with the explanation which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had given him, as he had pressed upon the right hon. Gentleman the necessity of also lowering the excise duty if he reduced the import duty on foreign hops. The right hon. Gentleman had said that he had no intention of making a permanent alteration in the duty this year, and he supposed he would not have departed from that determination had he not been justified by some extraordinary circumstances. It was not possible for the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or any other person at the present moment, to form a judgment upon the probable crop of hops until a very advanced period of the year. In 1849 the duty paid was only 75,000*l.*, but no interference was then thought necessary. He had this morning received a letter from a person in Kent well acquainted with hop plantations, who said that a very great improvement had taken place in them within the last few days, and that, in his opinion, a duty of from 80,000*l.* to 100,000*l.* would be paid if this weather continued. He, therefore, contended that the right hon. Gentleman was justified in calling for the alteration he now proposed. Supposing it were necessary that something should be done, were the grounds of the right hon. Gentleman fair and just towards all parties? Why was the relief to be given entirely at the cost of the home grower, and the advantage, if any, that attended the measure, be put into the hands of the foreign grower? The consumer would get nothing by the proposed change. The foreign grower would be the only gainer. If, however, the state of the crops justified the change, the right hon. Gentleman might carry it into effect by means of an Order in Council.

Mr. MASTERS SMITH contended that all the advantage of the proposed reduction of duty would benefit the holders in bond, and that neither the revenue nor the country would derive any benefit from it. The lowering of the duty had caused great dismay throughout the hop districts, and would, if sanctioned, have the effect of throwing the hop grounds of the country out of cultivation. He thought the right hon. Gentleman ought not, without great deliberation, to come to any decisive determination on this subject. When the Excise and Customs duties were combined he considered it was a wise arrangement; and that was the opinion of those hop-growers whom he represented. As to the Customs duty, it had from time to time been lessened to a great extent, whilst nothing was taken from the Excise duty. They were now about to inflict a blow on an interest in a state of panic. They were, in fact, about to take a crutch from a falling man. It took two years to prepare a hop ground, and the hop-growers were now in great doubt, owing to the measures of the Government, as to what course they ought to pursue. [The hon. Gentleman read several letters, detailing great improvements that had taken place this year in the growth of hops all over the country.] He would leave the matter in the hands of the Government, but hoped the measure would be modified.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY felt satisfaction at seeing that the county of Kent thought the hop duty was a bad one, as evidenced by the speech of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down; for that was what it proved, if it proved anything. He would support the proposal of the Government, because, at length, he saw some prospect of the duty being done away with altogether. The hop duty had no beneficial effect whatever in any district except the county of Kent. He was a hop-grower in the county of Sussex, and he felt sure that the Sussex hop-growers generally would feel grateful to the Government for the reduction.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, this was not a Kentish question alone. He was connected with the county of Worcester, and there the feelings of the hop-growers coincided with those in Kent, and felt it was most injurious to them to have these tamperings and sudden changes made at the end of a Session, by which the whole trade was affected. There was a strong suspicion current that although the consumer would not benefit by this change, there were a large number of persons who were holders of foreign hops, and who would benefit largely by the alteration; amongst whom he supposed, was the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Bass), having observed him to be in close communication with the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary to the Treasury, but hoped those Members of the Government would not be carried away by the blandishments of the hon. Member for Derby. He thought there was no adequate ground for the reduction, and he hoped either that he would reconsider the question, or if a reduction in the foreign duty was necessary, that he would answer that other proposition they had to make to him, namely, a similar modification of the Excise as of the Customs.

Mr. J. WILSON said, that the measure had been introduced at the instance of the officers of the Inland Revenue. The right hon. Gentleman said the reason for the measure had been removed by the improvement which had taken place in the probable yield of the crop. In 1852 the duty was 244,000*l.*, and the price was 4*l.* 5*s.* per cwt. In 1853 the duty fell to 150,000*l.*, and the price rose to 1*l.* 11*s.* What then would be the effect if it fell again to 80,000*l.*, or 100,000*l.*, which was the most flattering estimate that had been made. It was quite a mistake to suppose that the hop-growers were losers by bad crops. On the contrary they were large gainers by a deficient yield in consequence of the enormous increase of price. The reduction of the duty, however, 1*l.* 5*s.* would just render it possible to introduce the fine Bavarian qualities. The effect of the proposal would only be to place hops for a single year on exactly the same footing as every other article of home production, and surely such a modest proposal ought to receive the support of the House.

Mr. NEWDEGATE said, that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not take the responsibility of reducing this duty as the crop progressed, it was asking a great deal of the House to expect them to relieve him from the responsibility. He would be no party to a reduction of the Customs duty upon hops unless there was, at the same time, a reduction on the Excise duty.

SIR EDWARD DERING admitted that there was not that scarcity of the crop that was anticipated. He regretted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not listened to the suggestion of his hon. Colleague (Mr. Deedes) to carry out the change by an Order in Council. The House at present were not in a position to legislate. If the crop should turn out as had been anticipated, and the right hon. Gentleman advised an Order in Council, he would have the support of all the hop-growers.

Mr. BASS thought it would be unsafe for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to wait, because the duty was not declared until the end of November, and as foreign hops came earlier than this, the opportunity would be lost of purchasing these hops. Seeing that hops were only grown upon 50,000 acres, while barley was grown upon 2,000,000 acres, he did not think that hon. Gentlemen opposite ought to oppose the proposal of the Government to increase the quantity of hops available for the consumer.

Mr. CAYLEY was a representative of barley growers, and wished to see hops cheap. He was willing to vote for the reduction of duty on foreign hops, if the Government would only reduce the Excise duty.

MR. FREWEN asked the hon. Member for Derby if he had not betted that the duty would this year exceed 150,000*l.*, and if he had not made that bet within the last few days? [Mr. BASS: Certainly not.] He believed the hon. Member for Derby had betted upon this duty on former occasions, for the hon. Member had told him so himself.

TRANSPORTATION—TICKETS OF LEAVE.

LORD ST. LEONARDS rose to call the attention of the House to the present system of granting tickets of leave to convicts. The question, "What are we to do with our convicts?" was one of the most important social questions of the day. Previous to the introduction of the system by which transportation was in effect abolished, the practice, as their Lordships were well aware, was, after keeping a convict in prison in this country for a certain time, to send him to one of our colonies under sentence of transportation, but with a ticket of leave, which assured them of the means of earning a subsistence. The advantages of this system were numerous. In the first place, the convict was cut off from his old associations, and could not therefore in the new country to which he was transported come into contact with his former comrades or be led into the commission of crime by their companionship and example. In the next place, he found himself, on his arrival in the colony, under the control and supervision of the Government of the colony to which he was consigned. He was certain of being provided for, because, if no other employment offered itself, he was employed on the public works at good wages and liberal rations. He had at the same time perfect liberty to engage in private service whenever he found an opportunity; and such an opportunity was sure to offer itself almost immediately, because the demand for labour was always much greater than the supply in the colonies to which he was sent. He was employed at a fair rate of wages, excellent rations were insured, and he had a good prospect of bettering his condition. At the same time there was no objection to the granting of those tickets of leave, inasmuch as there were numbers of persons in the colony desirous of the services of convicts, and who took them with the full knowledge of their being ticket-of-leave men. He had thus every prospect of bettering his condition; and it was not unfrequent for men who went out in this capacity to become tradesmen, or in some instances to accumulate large property. Under this system there was, therefore, no impediment to the granting of tickets of leave. They had not the effect of turning a man loose into society without any means of living, or without the Government having any check upon him. On the contrary, he was sent to a new part of the world, where he was sure at once to meet with full encouragement for his labour and with full employment. Circumstances had, however, arisen, which had rendered it necessary to abolish convict transportation, and to substitute penal servitude for it. No one could find fault with the Government of the day for this change in the mode of punishment, because as the colonists had refused any longer to receive our convicts, it was clearly impossible to send them there. It was, indeed, a little singular that while the colonists as a body refused to receive our convicts, there was always an ample demand on the part of individuals for the labour of such of these men as were sent. When the late Government was in office, the subject of the change to be made in the mode of punishment necessarily occupied much of their attention, and it was their determination still to retain transportation as far as possible. They did not, indeed, intend to attempt to force convicts upon any colonies which objected to receive them ; but they desired to keep some remote island as a penal settlement, and thus to maintain both the terror and, to a limited extent, the use of transportation. Under the system adopted by the present Government, convicts, after remaining in prison for a certain time, received a licence to reside in any part of the United Kingdom or the Channel Islands, under such conditions as the Crown might think fit to prescribe, the licence being subject to revocation at the pleasure of the Crown. Now, when their Lordships considered the great difference in the state of things under which tickets of leave were formerly granted and those under which they had been granted since the late Act was passed, he thought they would see how difficult it must be to bring the old system to bear upon the new state of things. After the Act was passed there was no penal colony where a convict could be sent to, and where he would be subjected to the inducements to lead an honest life which he (Lord St. Leonards) had already described ; on the contrary, he was let loose, without any check or control, into a field where the demand for labour was much less, and where no human being would employ him if it was known that he had a ticket of leave. The Government had no means of employing him on Government works. Let them just consider in what a different position an unfortunate man turned loose in this country was from one who was sent to a colony under the old system ? As he had already said, such was the unhappy condition of society here, and such was the unwillingness to give employment to a convict, that he must start with a falsehood. He must conceal his real condition, and invent some story as to where he had been and what he had been doing. Nor was it only to his employer that he must give this account of his past life. No man could go to work with his fellows in any workshop or manufactory without giving an account of himself ; and if he gave a false account, he was almost sure to be discovered. An unfortunate man in this position was, therefore, almost without resources, and could hardly be expected to continue in the paths of honesty. Then with regard to the course to be pursued towards these men, it was no doubt difficult for the Government to decide what should be done. As their Lordships would remember, a short time ago, considerable discussion took place with respect to the case of a convict named Brown, who had been discharged with a ticket of leave, who stated that he was dogged by the police, who prevented his getting or keeping work by telling his employers that he was a discharged convict. On inquiry, the reverse turned out to be the case, and that the man had returned to his old habit of misconduct—but contrast the situation of such a man in this country with that of the ticket-of-leave men in a convict colony. They used to be under the control and protection of the Governor, and their ticket of leave, being a proof of good behaviour, obtained them employment instead of being a disqualification for employment, as in this country. It was, however, no doubt very difficult to know what to do with respect to these unhappy men, for if they were to be protected from interference on the one hand, society must also be protected on the other. He had not the slightest intention to bring any charge against the Government for the manner in which they had administered the present system ; but he certainly did wish that he could say that they appeared to have applied themselves earnestly and seriously to the discharge of the duty imposed upon them. He had lately moved for certain returns stating the number of tickets of leave granted, and the number which had been revoked ; also the number of convicts who had been convicted of any crime after receiving tickets of leave. From those returns it appeared that 1,200 tickets of leave had been granted during the last year ; yet it was stated that no communication had taken place between the Home Office and the prison authorities with respect to the ticket-of-leave men committed for fresh offences. It also appeared that no condition was attached to the grant of these tickets, nor any regulations made with regard to the conduct of those holding them. It was, indeed, notified to such persons that the power of the Crown to revoke these tickets would be exercised in case of misconduct, and that if they wished to retain the privilege they enjoyed they must prove themselves worthy of it. Now, if this notification was intended to be considered as a condition attached to the ticket of leave, it should have been placed on the back of it, and then the convict would always have it present to his mind whenever he looked at his ticket. But, then, in order to make this of any value, the Government must have power to carry into effect these threats—for so he must call them. But how, under the present system, could the authorities know whether these men—over whom they exercised no surveillance—led a vicious or a virtuous life? Why, when he asked for a return of the number of convicts who, after having received tickets of leave, had been since convicted of any crime, what was the answer? That the Home Office had no means of answering the question. But, who should have the means of answering the question, if the Home Office had not? It was evidently utterly impossible for the Home Office to judge of the operation of the ticket of leave, or to act upon the conditions on which it was said these tickets were granted, unless they were in a position to trace the conduct of their holders. It was the duty of the Home Office to exercise a general superintendence over the criminal jurisdiction of the country, and have an account of every conviction of ticket-of-leave man as soon as it took place. There had, in his opinion, been no system; and if there had, he should be glad to hear from the noble Duke what the system was, what the checks were, and what benefits were likely to arise from it. In round numbers there had been 1,200 tickets of leave issued since October, 1853. According to that rate 150 convicts a month had been turned loose upon society; and the question was, whether the country could absorb that amount of such a population without any provision being made for their control. He was strongly of opinion, that if a man were to have any chance in this country, they must not have a detective policeman always at his heels to warn people against trusting him; but, on the other hand, they must have some system and some means of enabling that man to earn an honest livelihood before society would generally adopt him or receive him as a labourer or servant. It appeared to him that what was necessary was, not to grant them tickets of leave, but that some place should be provided, which he believed could be provided, that would become a substitute to a certain extent for the colonies to which they were accustomed to transport them; and where the Government would have some means of providing employment for the men when they were first discharged—for it should be recollected that at present they discharged them direct from the prison gate into the general population. Let it be remembered that there was no probation, and that many a man would act well in prison, and while under control and under the eye of authority when he knew the consequences of doing so would be his emancipation, who would not, when turned loose on society, have the courage to resist his former habits and practices. What a man's conduct had been in prison was no satisfactory test of what his conduct would be when turned into society; it was necessary to have some system established by which they could have their eye on them, because they should have some check over them in letting them loose on the world. Considering the temptations and difficulties to which these ticket-of-leave men would be exposed, it was not at all surprising that they should sometimes relapse into their former habits; and he thought the man was entitled to great credit who, liberated from prison with a ticket of leave, won his way back to an honest position in society. By putting the convict through a certain state of probation they would be then able to recommend him to employment, and many a man would take a convict from the public works who would not otherwise be disposed to engage him, and when he had once got employment he might hope to redeem himself. He had received some very affecting letters from men who had been discharged with tickets of leave under the present system, and who related the difficulties they experienced in the attempts to earn an honest livelihood, and they would really very much surprise the House if he were at liberty to read them. He had a letter from a man, who, having received a ticket of leave, was desirous to go to his brother in Australia, but he was told it was contrary to the rule, and he could not go to Australia. He (Lord St. Leonards) could not see why a man who had a connection in Australia, and deserved a ticket of leave, should not be allowed to go there as well as remain in England, Ireland, or Scotland; but he was denied the liberty of going there, simply because he had a ticket of leave, and he got the ticket of leave from the very Government who denied him the permission to go. There was a case of a man whose brother proposed to give him the means of earning a livelihood by driving a cab; but when he went to Scotland-yard and asked for a licence, they said they could not give him a licence because he was a ticket-of-leave man. What was such a man to do? When he had the honour of being a Member of the late Government, nothing pressed more upon him than the difficulty to which he called their Lordships' attention, and he never could quite see his way; but he was sure that their Lordships would be of opinion that it was a question to which the Government ought to direct its most serious attention. He had no doubt the noble Duke opposite was desirous of doing all he could with reference to the adoption of some plan to remove the difficulty; but if a satisfactory plan should not be agreed upon, he (Lord St. Leonards) should think it to be his duty in the next Session to move for the appointment of a Select Committee to consider the whole question. In the meantime he hoped that the Government would take the matter into its serious attention, and prevent the necessity of such a motion on his part.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE: I can assure the noble and learned Lord that it was quite unnecessary for him, in the course of the observations which he has made to the House, to say that he had no desire to make any complaint of the Government in reference to their management of this matter; the whole conduct of the noble and learned Lord in the House with reference to the ticket-of-leave question affording quite sufficient proof of that, if he had not made the statement himself. I only regret that there is no Member of the Government in this House in more immediate connection with this particular question, and able to answer more in detail and more satisfactorily the observations that have been made by the noble and learned Lord. At the same time, having held the seals of the Colonial Office, and being the individual to advise the total cessation of transportation of our convicts to the colonies with the exception of Western Australia, I do feel a special interest on that account in the success of this great and most important experiment, and undoubtedly feel a large share of responsibility attaching to it. The noble and learned Lord had stated very fairly and accurately the circumstances under which transportation had been, with reference to many of the colonies abolished, and with reference to Western Australia diminished; and he said that the late Government had under consideration the question of adopting the system of transportation in some group of islands—but I do not know whether he meant the Falkland Islands or not. In the course of the discussions which took place on this question last year, I ventured more than once to point out to your Lordships that, although you might undoubtedly continue the system of transportation, that is to say, a system of removal of culprits from this country to some other spot, it was impossible to continue the system of transportation of late years adopted so long as the communities in our colonies were unwilling to receive them. Undoubtedly you might adopt a system in the Falkland Islands similar to that which had been carried on in Norfolk Island; but by adopting a system of transportation such as it was in the early days of that colony, and which, after a trial, was repudiated by the whole community of the colony, you would be engendering, and not correcting, crime. Such a system cannot be carried on in the Falkland Islands, or any other island belonging to this country. But I apprehend that the whole value of the system of transportation as it was carried on, existed in the very practice to which the noble and learned Lord referred, when he contrasted the system of ticket of leave in this country with the system in the colony, where he said there was a system of surveillance over the convicts intermixed with the pure population of the colony, and the population untainted by crime, with whom they might become intermixed at the termination of their period of punishment. But New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land desired to be relieved from any further importation of convicts, and the only spot now available is Western Australia. When therefore these countries repudiated the system on moral grounds, it became impossible for this country to continue transportation on the former system, and in my opinion it would be most unwise and, I may use the phrase, wicked to renew such a system under any circumstances. I do not say that in the course of time there may not arise other colonies young in origin, and extending probably over considerable districts of country, where—as West Australia does at present—for the financial advancement and establishment of the colony, they may be willing to accept convicts; and if such a state of things should arise, there will, I am sure, be no indisposition on the part of the Government to take the matter into consideration. But I cannot hold out any expectation to the country that colonies which have been already established will ever be found willing to accept convicts, and I trust that this country will never be found anxious to thrust them upon them, if such willingness to receive them does not exist. Such are the circumstances under which the present system was adopted. My noble and learned Friend stated that it was necessary in this or some other system to consider whether no new penal settlement could be established; but he was not quite correct in drawing the contrast between this country and the colonies so far as the position of the latter is concerned. My noble and learned Friend seems to be under the impression that these men, on receiving tickets of leave, are at a loss to find employment by which they might earn an honest livelihood. I do not know what particular instances have been brought to the attention of the noble and learned Lord; but he will admit that the cases drawn to his attention from the philanthropic disposition he has shown, in this House and elsewhere, on the subject, are likely to be cases of hardship, and therefore it is unfair to form an opinion from the individual letters that no doubt have been laid before him. The noble and learned Lord says that so great must be the dearth of private employment for those ticket-of-leave men, that it was desirable to establish a system of public works on which the convicts might be employed. I can assure my noble and learned Friend that it was intended, if there was any difficulty experienced in finding employment for them from private persons, that provision should be made to employ those convicts on public works until they could find employment. I can assure him that every attention has been paid to the demand for labour, with the view of employing them on public works if employment with private individuals could not be found for them; but such has not been, and is not at present, the case; and unless the necessity does arise for the adoption of a different course, I think it far better for the community at large to provide employment rather than to adopt a system of intermediate employment on public works. The noble and learned Lord said that the measure adopted by the Government was a mere gaol delivery, and that the convicts were periodically turned out of the prisons to find their way in the world, without any system having been adopted to prevent them returning to vicious courses, but I can assure the noble and learned Lord that he is mistaken, and when he shall read the reports that are about to be presented to the Secretary of State for the Home Department, he will see that there has been a system adopted. He seems to think that at the termination of the period of imprisonment they are merely released with those tickets of leave; but the fact is, that about a month before the time a convict is about to be released, either owing to his conduct in prison, or from the duration of his period of imprisonment having expired, a letter is invariably written by the chaplain of the gaol to individuals pointed out by the convict himself in their neighbourhood from whom he thinks it likely he might receive employment; and I am happy to say—and I say it to the honour of the individuals—those letters from the chaplains have been in the great majority of instances answered in the affirmative, and the convict has succeeded in obtaining employment. When those answers are unfavourable, steps are taken for finding employment for those individuals with other persons besides those pointed out by the convicts themselves, and up to the present time, as far as could be ascertained, the convicts who had been released had found no want of employment, with the exception of a few who have resorted to their old vicious habits. When convicts are released, they are taken by the officers of the prison to the railway and supplied with clothing suitable to the class of life they heretofore occupied and are again about to adopt, their fare is paid, and they are sent to the spot where they expect to find employment. As regards the sum to which they are entitled on their release, amounting sometimes to about 5*l.* or 6*l.*, the whole of that sum is not paid to them immediately, but a part is kept in reserve and paid to them occasionally, which has the additional advantage of continuing to a certain extent, without the aid of any watch or police, a certain degree of guard over them, and shows a continuance of the interest felt in them. These are only a few of the points of what I may call the system that has been adopted, and I mention them as the best way of correcting the erroneous opinion under which the noble and learned Lord has laboured, that no system has been adopted, but that the convicts are thrown upon the wide world without a chance of procuring employment. I believe the cases referred to by the noble and learned Lord, in which the convicts have resorted to their vicious habits are exceptional; and when we consider that out of 1,200 convicts who have hitherto been released, so far as we know, much less than 1 per cent have resorted to vicious habits—I do not mean to say that that is exactly the result, but we must argue from what we know—we must admit that that is certainly an extraordinary small proportion. It is so small that I cannot hope that it is likely to continue. It may extend on some future occasion to 15 or 16 per cent; but when the proportion is so small as at present, it would be only fair to say that the system has not met with that utter want of success which many persons anticipated at the commencement. The noble and learned Lord said there were no conditions attached to the licences granted to convicts, and he had been surprised to hear the noble and learned Lord say that it would have been right for some notice in writing to be given to the convicts. The noble and learned Lord had been misled, for the fact was, the system which the noble and learned Lord suggested had been adopted, and upon the back of the document given to the convict were certain printed conditions, under which the ticket of leave was granted. No blame attached to the noble and learned Lord for having taken this objection, and he was only happy to inform the noble and learned Lord that the case stood much better than was supposed. My noble and learned Friend has referred to the number of convicts that have been set at liberty and reconvicted; but when I last saw Colonel Jebb I put the question to him for the purpose of ascertaining the number again convicted. He said it was impossible to state accurately without investigation, and without knowing the names of the Judges and of the magistrates; but that, so far as information had been obtained, there was an extraordinarily small number of reconvictions. The noble and learned Lord has alluded to a special case, such as I am not surprised should raise a feeling of great interest in his mind; but, at the same time, it would be unfair to judge of the system from this case. The noble and learned Lord has referred to a ticket-of-leave man, who had the means of going to Australia, and he asked why he should not be allowed to go there? Why, for no other reason than this; it was felt when the Act was passed last year, that if the Government did anything from which it was to be inferred that they were doing indirectly what they would not do directly, they would be offering an insult to the colonists, and that the colonists would have a right to complain. Therefore, the tickets of leave are confined to the United Kingdom alone, and if there is to be any watch at all maintained over them, that is necessary. We have no right to let them into the world at large, or permit them to go into the Colonies or to foreign countries, and if we did, the Colonies and foreign countries would say they had a right to complain. To maintain, however slightly, a system of watchfulness over them, that watchfulness must be exercised by the authorities at home, and, therefore, it is necessary that the ticket of leave should be confined to the United Kingdom. A great objection has been urged to the system, on the ground that the convicts were left to be watched by policemen and were looked upon with suspicion, and were unable in consequence to find employment. I think it right, to remove any misconception that may exist as regards the police authorities, to assure the noble and learned Lord that instructions have been given to the policemen not to follow men who have tickets of leave, but, on the contrary, to render them facilities for obtaining employment. Whilst on the one hand it is desirable that we should keep up, as far as possible, some acquaintance with those men, it must not be done by policemen dogging them, but by the adoption of a mode with which no one is better acquainted than the noble Earl opposite, who has paid some attention to this subject, and by which we may keep up an acquaintance with those people. The noble and learned Lord may be sure that this question will not be lost sight of, and we shall have in this particular instance the assistance of a most able man, whose whole soul is wrapt up in the subject—I mean Colonel Jebb. If this great experiment can succeed in any man's hands, I am sure it will in his; and I am sure that every exertion will be made by him to justify this and the other House of Parliament in making this great experiment with respect to convicts in this country.

LORD CAMPBELL said, he did not disbelieve that very great exertions had been made to render this experiment successful, but he despaired of its ever being made so. Though only 1,200 convicts had been as yet discharged, there were thousands convicted every year, and they must be dealt with. Was it possible to expect that year after year those exertions to obtain employment could continue and be successful? They would find in this country, as had been found in other countries where transportation was unknown, that the number of convicts would greatly multiply, and that to try to reform them in their own country would be impossible. He had no doubt that every exertion had been made, and would continue to be made, to diminish the evils of the system; but what had been stated by his noble and learned Friend with regard to persons who obtained tickets of leave was quite true—namely, either that it would be known they had been convicted, and they would not be employed, or they must conceal by a lie their own former history; and in the latter case their previous character was always liable to be discovered at any moment, and they would be obliged to fly from one part of the country to another to avoid exposure. In his (Lord Campbell's) experience, when sentence of transportation was pronounced in open court, it not only made a deep impression on the convict himself, but upon all who heard it; and that sentence exercised more influence in producing good conduct than the actual infliction of the punishment itself. On the contrary, when a prisoner was sentenced to four years' penal servitude, he viewed the sentence with comparative indifference. In the first place he did not understand what it meant, and he next flattered himself that he was not to be sent out of the country, but was to be kept imprisoned for a few years where his confinement would probably be abridged, and that in the meantime he would only have some easy work to do that would give him very little annoyance. He had another remark to make with respect to the effect of the system of transportation upon industry. It was calculated that in the Australian colonies as many as 40,000 persons who had formerly been transported were now honestly and usefully employed in situations in which they maintained their families respectably; and there could be no doubt that if these persons had remained in England they must have led a life of continued crime, bringing lasting misery upon themselves, and preying upon the property of the country.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY concurred in much that had fallen from the noble and learned Lord who spoke last, but thought that great difficulty surrounded the question on every side. The persons who were generally sentenced to transportation were not prisoners brought up for their first offence, but mostly belonged to a class of criminals who were thoroughly initiated into a course of vice and crime. The reform of the offender was a consideration that ought not to be overlooked, and one quite as important as was his punishment. There could be no doubt that a person who had passed through a term of penal servitude, even if disposed to lead a new life, had very great discouragement to encounter in his endeavour to gain an honest livelihood; and such persons were often compelled to resort to their old courses, and were the means of inveigling younger persons into the same vicious career. The ticket-of-leave system was, however, as the noble Duke stated, only an experiment; and he hoped that after it had had a fair and sufficient trial, the whole subject would be brought under the review of Parliament.

LORD ST. LEONARDS briefly replied. He said that the explanation of the noble Duke was satisfactory as far as it went, and he felt assured that the question would receive additional consideration from the Government during the recess.

NATIONAL EDUCATION—ADJOURNED DEBATE (SECOND NIGHT.)

Order of the Day for resuming the adjourned Debate [July 24] on the proposed Resolution read.

Debate resumed accordingly.

LORD BROUGHAM: * My Lords, I have certainly but faint hopes of being able to fix the attention of your Lordships upon an adjourned debate, however important the subject; and the rather because when I moved these one and twenty Resolutions, I abstained from reading them, that I might spare you the fatigue of hearing the statements repeated which had formed the substance of my address to the House. They were thus only printed in the Votes; and with all my respect for your industry in performing legislative duties, I can hardly believe that you devote much time to the perusal of those records of your proceedings; so that it is very much to be questioned if any one of your Lordships has become acquainted with a single word of these Resolutions. [The Earl of ABERDEEN: Don't take that for granted.] My noble Friend opposite (the Marquess of Lansdowne) and my noble and learned Friends near him (Lord Chancellor and Lord Chief Justice Campbell) objected to my withdrawing the Resolutions when I had moved them, and they refused to have the previous question upon them put, lest it might be supposed that the House had disagreed with them. But as I could hardly expect so many important propositions, some of them statements of fact, others of principle, could be agreed to without further discussion, in concert with my noble Friends, the course was taken of adjourning the debate. I do not purpose to revive and continue it at present; but one of the Resolutions, the seventeenth, together with the provisions grounded upon it, in the Bill now on your table, is of such paramount importance that I must crave your indulgence while I open the great question to which it relates—that of the difficulty found to beset the subject of popular education on every side, and meeting us at each step of our progress, from the religious differences existing in this country. For my own part, I have always held the opinion, from which I will not say I have been driven by compulsion, but by compulsion I certainly have been driven most reluctantly to modify or qualify its practical application, that the true mode of educating the people is to provide the means of secular instruction, and keep religious instruction apart from it; or at least teaching in schools those truths on which all sects are agreed, and leaving those truths on which they differ to be taught by the parents of each child, the pastors of each sect.

In a community like this, filled with various religious classes, and whose religious zeal is happily so fervent—I say happily, because whatever dissensions it may engender, and whatever difficulties it may occasion, its warmth at least proves the strength and sincerity of religious conviction—it has always appeared nearly impossible to plant schools in which the children of various sects may be taught, unless their instruction is confined to secular learning, while their religious teaching is left to their parents or their pastors. But this principle by no means excludes whatever security may be required for their receiving that instruction at home, and for their attending the church to which their parents resort, supposing their attendance at the school service or school church dispensed with. This is the opinion, and with this qualification rather than exception, which I have ever held, and in common with men whose great worth was not more remarkable than the strength of their religious feelings, so that it is grounded on anything rather than indifference on this most important matter. I refer to my lamented friend the late Duke of Bedford; but I may besides cite those who also bore the foremost part in the kindred, nay, identical controversy of the British and Foreign Bible Society, Mr. Wilberforce, Mr. Whitbread, Zachary Macaulay, William Smith, who differing with them on many other points, agreed on this, and agreed with them also in being a truly pious man.

At first, and I may add for very many years after the system of schools for all was introduced, it was no part of the plan that any care should be taken for religious instruction, because the difficulties were found to be all but insuperable, of combining that with secular teaching; and it was found almost equally difficult to exact any security for religious instruction out of school, unless some such instruction should be connected with the school teaching. Still, as the extreme importance of obtaining some such security was admitted on all hands, I was induced to insert a provision in the Bills of 1837, 1838, and 1839, which had received the entire approval and support of the Government (Lord Melbourne's), and I have introduced it into the Bill now on your table. It requires that all schools to be either planted, or assiated by the rate which the municipal bodies are authorised to levy, shall be open to all classes, teaching no catechism, compelling no attendance at church service, where parents either object to the catechism or the service, but requiring satisfactory proof that the religious instruction and attendance on divine service is cared for by the parents or guardians in their own way. When we consider the division of the community into so many sects, we at once perceive the absolute necessity of some such principle governing our provisions for popular education, if, indeed, we are not led at once the full length of adopting the peremptory separation, of secular from religious instruction, on which, however, I repeat, the general sense of the country, and of Dissenters as well as Churchmen, has pronounced a sentence of condemnation.

But the religious divisions to which I advert are well calculated to make us feel all the difficulty of combining the two kinds of instruction in one system. On one side we have the Establishment and its schools, where the Catechism is taught, the Liturgy used, and attendance on the Church service required; and here there is no difficulty, because the hundreds of thousands of children attending these schools, and answering to the millions of Churchmen, belong to one body, all professing a religious belief which is one and the same. So it is sometimes said, there being the Dissenters on the other hand—let schools be provided for their children, where no Church Catechism, Liturgy, or attendance is required, but the instruction is given according to their dissenting views. And nothing could be more easy than such an arrangement if the sects, like the Church, were one and the same; but, unfortunately, they are five and thirty—twenty-seven British and eight foreign; there are divisions and subdivisions: thus, when we speak of Methodists as a sect, we are speaking of nine sects; for there are the two great divisions of Arminian and Calvinistic, and the Arminians are subdivided into seven, the Calvinists into two. So the Baptists are five sects, not one; and thus, when we speak of Methodists and Baptists as if they were two sects, we, in fact, are speaking of no less than fourteen, which, with the Roman Catholics, the Presbyterians, the Independents, the Unitarians, and others, make in all five and thirty different persuasions. True, some of these subdivisions only differ from each other by slight variations, or shades of diversity in opinion; and hence, if we had no experience to guide us, we might infer that their repugnance to each other, their determination to keep aloof, their mutual repulsion as it were, would be feeble in the like proportion. But, alas! alas! it is just the other way. The nearer they approach in doctrine and discipline, the wider is their severance in feeling; the more alike their religious belief and political structure, the more they disagree, the greater is their mutual repugnance. It seems to be the law that governs religious dissensions and spiritual animosity. The Odium Theologicum seems, like gravitation, only that it is repulsive and not attractive, to act inversely as the distance, or even in a higher proportion to the proximity of faith. To establish anything like a common action among the zealots of these sects is manifestly impossible. Nothing could satisfy, or indeed appease them, but the establishment of schools for each of the different persuasions, a thing utterly impracticable.

Happily, however, the same spirit does not prevail in all the denominations, or at least among all the members of each. There is the most satisfactory evidence that a great proportion of Dissenters avail themselves of the instruction afforded by the Church schools, and it is probable that far more of each sect send their children thither than to other dissenting seminaries. If we take the census returns framed upon the Church attendance on the 31st March, 1851, we may reckon 8,000,000 as the number of persons belonging to the Establishment; 5,700,000 as those of all the 35 sects, leaving about 4,200,000 not professing to join with any denomination. It has no doubt been said that those returns are of questionable accuracy as regards the proportion of churchmen to dissenters, and a Right Rev. Friend of mine (Bishop of Oxford) lately adduced facts to illustrate this position. But admitting all that can be alleged in support of this argument, the estimate of the number of Dissenters on which I am grounding my inference, will not be affected, because there is the margin of 4,200,000 to be distributed; and it must be granted that a certain proportion of these belong to the sects. I will allow by far the greater number to the Church, but I think were my Right Rev. Friend here, he would admit that increasing the number of 8,000,000, shown by the returns, to the extent of 9,000,000, and diminishing by that addition the 5,000,000 of Dissenters, we cannot add the whole 4,200,000 to the Church, giving it above 13,000,000. It is manifest, therefore, that nearer 6,000,000 than 5,000,000 must belong to the sects, or about 5,700,000. Now, in this population, what is the proportion of children attending schools? By the statements which I made the other evening, and for the reasons then urged, it appears that there should be about 700,000. But the returns don't show above 240,000 attending the dissenting schools, leaving more than 450,000 who must receive their education elsewhere. The great desire of Dissenters to obtain instruction for their children is undeniable; it has at all times most honourably distinguished them; they were the earliest in the field as promoters of popular education; and the number of children which I have just stated, must therefore receive education either at private seminaries or at church schools. At private seminaries, it is evident that only the children of the wealthier classes can be taught, and as these attend school much longer than others, there must on that account be an addition made to the number which was taken upon the general average for all classes. So that nearly the whole 450,000, certainly 400,000, are to be regarded as attending the National or Church Schools. This is a fact of the greatest importance, and it is hard to say whether there results from it more credit to the wise liberality of the Church or of the sects; for it shows on the one hand, that generally speaking, no attendance or instruction is enforced, which can offend conscientious scruples on matters of importance, and it proves on the other hand, that the mere name of the establishment, and the connection with it of the patrons and teachers, does not raise a prejudice sufficient to outweigh the Dissenter's desire of education for his child. We may thus derive very great comfort from observing that the good sense of the greater number both among Churchmen and sectaries, prevails over the bigoted violence of zealots, leads the one class to keep open the doors of their schools to all, by forbidding any compulsion, either as to catechism or divine service, and keeps the other class above the folly of indulging in groundless prejudices, rather against the name of an establishment than its substance.

But upon this wise forbearance, as the cardinal point, hinges the power of that establishment to benefit those without its pale. Its schools can only be accessible to all by the exclusion of whatever shuts their doors against conscientious Dissenters. Yet it is lamentable to reflect that while the Church has thus distinguished itself, those who had originally taken the lead against all exclusive views, all dogmatic tests, all observances which could by possibility introduce disqualification on religious grounds, have lately departed widely from these wise and tolerant principles. With the British and Foreign School Society, I have been intimately acquainted, I may say connected from its commencement in 1810, under another name; indeed I presided at the preliminary meeting held to found it, attended by W. Allen, Joseph Fox, Thomas Clarkson, and others, who had stood by Joseph Lancaster in his great difficulties. In the following spring, the Duke of Bedford presided over its first public meeting. Under his auspices, and those of the Duke of Kent, father of Her Majesty, one of the most zealous and useful friends of the Institution, it gathered strength; and its fundamental principle, that which distinguished it from the National Society, soon after established, was the rigorous exclusion of all differences on religious grounds, the severance of secular from religious instruction, the repudiation of whatever could by any possibility operate as a test—the principle embodied in its motto of Schools for All. Judge then of my astonishment when I lately heard that steps had been taken to shut the doors of this Institution against Unitarians, and deprive them of its benefits by requiring the acceptance of religious dogmas to which they cannot assent. Among the sects to which I have adverted, the Unitarians are in point of numbers nearly the least conspicuous; they amount to little more than 60,000; but they are for the most part in easy circumstances, and for their character and habits much respected. They make great exertions for the education of their children; but their poor, though not numerous, are in want of the means of instruction, especially in some parts of the West of England. Applying to the teachers connected with the Society and its officers, the pastors of the Unitarians have found that in its schools religious doctrines are required to be taught to which no conscientious Unitarian can subscribe. To such an extent has this departure from its fundamental principles proceeded, that I hold in my hand the opinion given by two learned friends of mine, the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas when he was Attorney General, and Mr. Rolt, the eminent King's Counsel, who being consulted upon the statement of the Society itself, signed by its Secretary, pronounced without hesitation that the Society is guilty of a constant breach of trust in dealing with the funds given or bequeathed to it on the faith of its original or fundamental principles, but now applied to support schools from whence Unitarians are excluded by the religious dogmas taught, by the test thus exacted from teachers, the standard of supposed orthodoxy to which the scholar must conform; and this by the Society which plumes itself upon rejecting all manner of exclusion, arrogates to itself the peculiar function of holding schools for all, and is constituted, both in its patrons and in its members, most chiefly of Dissenters from the National Church. So much for the tolerance of those who charge the Church with exclusive principles; so much for the fancy that intolerance is confined to establishments.

I have heard it once and again affirmed that Unitarians are not Christians; and some in their unreflecting zeal—some even of those whom I sincerely respect—have gone so far as to call Socinianism a half-way house towards infidelity; forgetting that a half-way house, from the nature of the thing, ex vi termini, must be as well from as towards—either to infidelity, or from infidelity to Christianity; and accordingly I have known eminent converts from the superstitions of the East who were Socinians. But when misguided men of more zeal than knowledge would thus distinguish the Unitarian from the Christian, whom, I will ask, do we fondly cite as our highest authorities when we are engaged in defending our religion against its infidel adversaries? In arguing with these upon the evidences, how often has one said, “What better would you have than that which satisfied the greatest masters of science, the great luminaries of law? Who was ever a better judge of legal evidence than Hale, of moral evidence than Locke, of mathematical and physical evidence than Newton?” And yet Locke at one time laboured under grave suspicion of Unitarianism, groundless, perhaps, though he was at the least an Arian. But that Newton was a Unitarian is quite certain. [Lord CAMPBELL expressed some dissent, saying he was an Arian.] No—as thorough a Unitarian as ever attended Essex Street Chapel. My noble and learned Friend will find this clearly proved by Sir D. Brewster from examination of the Newton MSS. which, that learned person says, leave not the shadow of a doubt upon the subject. Your Lordships, indeed, are not Unitarians; I question if there be one in this House. [Lord CAMPBELL: There have been.] Certainly there have; the Duke of Grafton and others; with them we may not agree; but assuredly their errors are not to be corrected by denying that Sir Isaac Newton was a Christian, or Dr. Lardner—he to whose writings the defence of our religion owes so great an obligation, that they form a large proportion, nay the very foundation, of Dr. Paley’s celebrated work. With these eminent men you may differ; you may keep aloof as wide as you will from them; but it is not by denying the Christianity of Newton and Lardner that you can turn Socinians aside from their track. Neither of their heresies nor of far greater than theirs, have I the least dread. I have no alarm for the truth—no fear of error. Let truth be left to the attacks of its enemies, error to the care of its friends, and I have no apprehension of the result. But one thing I do fear; one thing does alarm me; and that is persecuted error. That fills me with apprehension; for well I know that whether openly persecuted or secretly oppressed—cruelly treated or subjected to injustice, annoyance, and vexation—it straightway becomes formidable. Maltreatment gives it the only chance of success, makes it by degrees wear the garb of truth, and ends by usurping her place. I hope and trust that the notice taken of that grievous mistake into which the men I allude to have been betrayed—well-meaning men but overzealous, and without knowledge to temper and guide their zeal—may lead them to regain the right path from which they have strayed to correct the abuse which they have countenanced.

It is my confident hope that the Bill on your table, giving effect to the Resolution which I have been discussing, will receive the sanction of your Lordships, and that effectual means may thus be afforded, of giving where they are most wanted the blessings of education to all classes, without regard to their religious persuasion. We hear of maladies breaking out in certain districts detached one from another. The great evil of ignorance is also found to exist dispersed; and I would apply to it a sporadic remedy by giving our municipal bodies the power of planting schools at the cost of the communities subject to their government, but schools open to the children of all, whether Protestants or Catholics, Churchmen or Dissenters, and kept open by rules preventing all compulsory teaching of catechism, all compulsory attendance on divine service. This has been found easily effected in the North, upon the principles so wisely and so liberally laid down by Dr. Hook; for, at Edinburgh, I know that the children of various sects receive religious instruction in the same place at different hours, from different pastors, while they receive secular instruction at the same hours from the same teachers. But wise by the experience of my noble Friend in the Home Department (Lord Palmerston), who has unfortunately been frustrated in his attempts to improve our police, by the jealousy of corporate towns, I have provided that the municipalities shall have the most uncontrolled management of their schools, subject only to having the rating power withdrawn by the Education Committee of the Privy Council for a breach of the conditions on which it had been granted, such especially as the cardinal one of keeping the schools open to all classes. If they choose to change the fundamental rules, they must rely on other funds than the rate. I look forward to this measure as yielding a fair promise of successfully grappling with the religious difficulty, as it has been termed, which has hitherto obstructed our course. But I also look to my noble Friends who in the Privy Council administer the distribution of the grants for education, and I expect that they too will continue to put down all exclusive plans on the part of those who receive this aid, under what name soever they may approach the Committee, and will sternly discountenance such proceedings as I have been under the painful necessity of describing and denouncing—proceedings taken in violation of all principle, in display only of intolerant bigotry, and in furtherance of its unlawful designs.

LORD CAMPBELL merely rose to express his disapproval of the manner in which, as his noble and learned Friend had said, the Unitarians had been persecuted. He (Lord Campbell) was not aware that Sir Isaac Newton was a Socinian; he had always believed him to have been an Arian; he believed, however, that the Socinians numbered among themselves many men of good education, of great attainments, and of irreproachable lives. Though this sect laboured under what he conceived to be a lamentable error, still they were Christians, and ought to be treated as such. Until the repeal of the Statutes of William III. Socinians had laboured under various disabilities, and were not entitled to all the privileges of the Act of Uniformity, but now they were placed on the same footing as the other religious sects, and, though hoping that they might see their error, he yet trusted that, while they continued in their error, they would be treated as Christian brethren, and not, as they had been, as something worse than infidels.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that, as he had on a former occasion replied to the noble and learned Lord (Lord Brougham), he should now only trouble their Lordships with a few observations. With regard to the principle laid down by the noble and learned Lord as to the propriety of not making the Catechism compulsory in the case of children of other communions or creeds in the same school, no one could feel more strongly on this than he (Earl Granville) did; as he did not think that there could be any doubt as to the immense advantages resulting in the one case, and the immense disadvantages in the other. His noble Friend could, with him, affirm that great difficulties in apportioning the grants of the Privy Council had arisen in certain small villages in which, in the schools established, the Church Catechism was made a compulsory part of the instruction of the children. In many of these instances, the Dissenters had made application for funds for the purpose of setting up a school in opposition to the Church school. This had given rise to much difficulty, as the Government thought that in these villages one school could amply supply their educational wants, and that it would be an absolute waste of money to contribute towards the establishment of two schools. The children, therefore, in many of those villages did not avail themselves of the means of education afforded to them, which they otherwise would do if instruction in the Catechism were not made compulsory. He was happy to be able to state that there were many of the schools connected with the National Schools in which the Catechism was not made compulsory. He had that evening been informed by a clergyman, who had laboured in the schools where the Catechism was compulsory, that he was much struck with the disadvantages arising from such a system, and that he was most anxious that a Bill should be introduced, that in those schools to which the Privy Council grants were made, instruction in the Catechism should not be compulsory. He would venture to make a suggestion to his noble and learned Friend with reference to school books, which at present were not so cheap nor so good as they might be, considering the great demand there was for them. The greatest improvements in school books had been introduced into Ireland by the Irish Board of Education. He would suggest that the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, or some society of that kind, might render most valuable aid to the educational cause by introducing cheap and efficient books. He believed that this would not prove unprofitable, for the Irish books sold in England lately had absolutely doubled their former sale; and, were this subject to be taken up by a society, it would give a most useful stimulus to publishers.

LORD BROUGHAM was extremely glad that his noble Friend had in his remarks entered into the subject of the care required to keep Church schools open to all classes, and he (Lord Brougham) had, he believed, rather understated the degree in which this had been already acted upon. The statements which he had this night made from the returns seemed to show how prevalent liberal views were among the patrons and directors of Church schools. He could not, indeed, refrain from a hope, grounded upon the conduct both of Church and sects, that it might be found possible to arm municipal bodies with the absolute discretion of making rules for schools under the Bill, although he had added a provision somewhat tending to narrow this discretion. He thought it extremely possible that the Dissenters being represented as well as the Church in the town councils, a compromise might be come to, and schools with different rules supported by the rate, so that different denominations might in name, as well as in substance, be suited. Considering the number of sects, this, no doubt, would depend upon their members exercising great forbearance, as he hoped they might, for the sake of promoting education. But, for the present, he deemed it advisable to frame the Bill as he had done. He would add, that he also agreed with what had fallen from his noble Friend as to school books. The Society for Diffusing Useful Knowledge, to which his noble Friend referred, had laboured, and he might say successfully, to provide books for popular instruction, but almost entirely for adults. After many years of such exertion, and in which, as he stated the other day, it had succeeded not only in bringing down the price of books, but in causing several hundreds of works to be prepared on subjects not before treated of at all, or not treated of in a satisfactory manner, it had found that, partly by such publications of its own, and partly by the stimulus given to other societies and to individual authors, the great work seemed to be nearly done for which it had been instituted, and for two or three years past it had rested from its labours. He did not, therefore, see how it could act upon his noble Friend's very proper suggestion; but he trusted that some other society might be found to perform the highly useful duty in question.

His noble Friend was quite right in referring to the caution necessary, both in justice to the bookselling trade, and in order not to frustrate the object in view, both of which considerations made it most improper for Government to interfere in publishing school books. The Useful Knowledge Society was incorporated by charter in 1837; but when he framed that charter he took care to insert a prohibition against the Society deriving any profit whatever from its publications. Accordingly the gain upon one work which yielded profit was applied to pay the expenses of other works which could only be published at a loss; but no gain whatever could be received by the Society upon the balance of the accounts. To a voluntary and unincorporated society, wholly independent of the Government, undertaking the important office of preparing and publishing good school books, there could be no objection from any quarter; and he agreed with his noble Friend that this would be most useful. The Society to which reference had been made was quite aware of this great want, and had repeatedly referred to it in the course of its publications, and of its proceedings. He rather thought a Committee had been specially appointed on the subject, either upon his own, or the Vice President (Lord Althorp's) suggestion. That no interference of the Government can be allowed in any way, is perfectly evident. The least approach to a censorship of the press, which such interference must lead to, is never on any account to be tolerated. None but the enemies of education, as well as liberty, could entertain such a project for one instant.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL (CANADA) BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, that its object was to enable the Legislature of Canada—if it desired to do so—to alter the constitution of one of its branches—namely, the Legislative Council, and for that purpose to repeal or alter the section of the Imperial Act for the Union of Canada, passed in 1840, which had reference to the manner in which the Legislative Council should be appointed. The Bill had been introduced into the other House of Parliament by the noble Duke lately at the head of the Colonial Office (the Duke of Newcastle), and this was the reason that the measure had not reached that House at an earlier period of the Session. It was, however, some time since the attention of Her Majesty's Government was called to the subject of this Bill. About the middle of last year the Government received two addresses from the Canadian Legislature—one from the Assembly, and the other from the Legislative Council. The address of the Assembly requested that the power which it was proposed to give them by this Bill might be conferred upon the Legislature, while the address of the Council remonstrated against such concession. The address of the Assembly pointed out the importance of introducing the elective principle into the constitution of the Upper House, and suggested a plan by which the Council might be rendered elective. The Assembly of Canada, at the time the address was passed, consisted of eighty-four members, but the number had since been raised to 130; these members were divided between two parts of the province which used to be called Upper and Lower Canada; the constituencies which returned them embraced a very large portion of the whole adult male population, and he believed that no popular assembly could more fairly represent public opinion. The address was adopted by the Assembly at the invitation of a member of the executive Government, and the following was the most important passage which it contained—

"We, your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Canada, in Provincial Parliament assembled, humbly beg leave to represent to your Majesty that, under the circumstances in which the province of Canada is placed in a social, political, and economical point of view, we are humbly of opinion that the introduction of the elective principle into the constitution of the Legislative Council would not only impart greater weight to that important branch of the Legislature than it can have under existing arrangements, however judiciously the selection of its members may be made, but would also ensure greater efficiency in carrying out that system of government which obtains in the mother country, and has been happily introduced into this province."

That paragraph was not adopted without a division, but it was carried by a majority of fifty-one to fourteen, showing that four-fifths of the Assembly were in favour of this change. Looking over the minutes of the proceedings, he thought he might say he doubted whether there was a single member of the Assembly who really objected to the enactment of such a measure as that now before the House. The address of the Legislative Council was, as he had intimated, of an opposite character, and remonstrated against the concession of the power which would be conferred by the Bill. He fully allowed that all proper weight was due to the representations of the intelligent and experienced men who had seats in the Council, but their opposition was only natural, inasmuch as under the scheme which was proposed by the Assembly in their address, these gentlemen would be deprived at intervals of a greater or less number of years, of the seats which they now held for life. It appeared to Her Majesty's Government that the application of the Assembly was a most important one, and that they were bound not to act with precipitation, but to consider the subject carefully and deliberately. Now, the importance of this Bill did not in any way arise from its involving any innovations in colonial administration. The principle of the Bill was one which, on several occasions in the course of the last few years, the Home Government had recognised and acted upon in relation to the government of our Colonies. The importance of the present Bill arose from the application of this principle to that colony, which was the first in importance among all the great colonies of this country. The effect of this example would most assuredly be felt, not only in the adjoining provinces of British North America, which possessed constitutions similar to that of Canada, but, in all probability, in the Colonies of Australia, where, at this moment, the question of the constitution of the upper of the two Legislative bodies, which it was proposed should share between them the functions of legislation, in place of the existing Legislative Councils, was a subject of public deliberation and debate. The fact that the petition of the Legislative Council of New South Wales expressly desired a constitution corresponding not to the British constitution, which was supposed to be the model of all our colonial constitutions, but to that of the province of Canada, showed, he thought, the importance of any measure of this kind. The address of the Canadian Assembly, to which he had before referred, reached Her Majesty's Government at so late a period of the year, that they did not feel justified in introducing any measure on the subject during the last Session. They determined, therefore, to consider the question during the recess, and to avail themselves of the visit paid to this country by the Governor General of Canada, the Earl of Elgin, to consult with him personally as to the course he would recommend. He thought the House would agree with him that no person could be better qualified than Lord Elgin, by his political experience, his intimate acquaintance with the affairs of Canada, his experience during the period of six or seven years for which he had presided over the Government of the Colony, and, above all, by his entire freedom from any party conflicts in the Colony, to afford valuable information on this subject to Her Majesty's Ministers. One of the most prominent features of Lord Elgin's administration had been, that since the introduction into Canada of responsible government he had abstained from identifying himself personally with any party in the province, and he had cordially co-operated with any Government, no matter who its members might be, possessing the confidence of the Assembly, in promoting the welfare of the Colony. The Government accordingly consulted with Lord Elgin, whose opinion entirely confirmed the statement that noble Lord made when he sent to Her Majesty's Government the address of the Canadian Assembly—

"I feel it my duty, in transmitting this address, to state that I know of no expedient which is so likely to impart to the Legislative Council the influence which it is most desirable that it should possess as the substitution of the principle of election for that of nomination by the Crown in the appointment of its members."

The present measure, then, came before the House as the expression of the public opinion of the people of Canada, supported by the approval of the Governor General, and with the sanction of the other House of Parliament. The object of the Bill was to enable the Legislature of Canada to alter the fundamental basis of the Legislative Council. The Bill did not propose to make the Legislative Council an elective body, but merely provided that it should be competent to the Canadian Legislature, either to retain the Legislative Council as it now existed, or to alter its constitution as they might think fit. It might be asked, perhaps, why the Crown, in the exercise of its prerogative, could not confer the power sought to be given by this Bill, without the intervention of Parliament? When the Crown granted constitutions to conquered colonies it might, he believed, impose restrictions upon the powers of the popular assemblies which it created, but it had not been usual of late years to impose such restrictions; and when representative institutions were granted to the Cape of Good Hope especial care was taken that full and unlimited control over their own constitution should be given by Order in Council to the popular bodies then created. The constitution of Canada was, however, a Parliamentary constitution, and therefore it was necessary to apply to that House to sanction the powers which this Bill would give to the Legislature of Canada. If the Crown conferred representative institutions on a colony, the popular assemblies had in every instance, as a matter of course, full control over the institutions thus given. Thus the colony of New Brunswick had its constitution from the Crown, and it might at any moment make its Legislative Council elective if it pleased, subject to the exercise of the negative of the Crown on the acts of its Legislature. He mentioned New Brunswick because on a former occasion Earl Grey, when Colonial Secretary, stated to the Lieutenant Governor of that province that the Government of which he was a Member had no objection to the introduction of the elective principle into the Legislative Council of the Colony. But the explanation of the necessity existing in the present case for coming to Parliament was, that the constitution of Canada was a Parliamentary constitution, and had been so from its origin, having been established and regulated by the Acts of 1774, 1791, and 1840—the first conferring legislative powers on the Governor and a Council nominated by himself; the second dividing Canada into two parts, and creating a different constitution in each, one a Council named by the Governor, the other an Assembly chosen by the people; the third reuniting Canada, and amalgamating the two Legislatures into a Council nominated by the Crown, and a popularly elected Assembly. It was not competent for the Colonial Legislature to exercise any powers except those expressly given by those Acts, and that of 1840 did not confer power to alter in any manner those of its provisions which had reference to the Legislative Council. It might be asked whether there was any instance of Parliament granting a constitution to a colony, and, at the same time, conferring upon the Colonial Legislature which it created power to alter or to destroy the arrangement proposed by the Imperial Parliament. He begged to remind the House of a recent instance in which this course had been pursued. The Act which conferred constitutions upon the Australian Colonies granted to them full power to alter the constitutions provided by that Act, and to adopt, if they thought fit, the elective principle. When the Act of 1840 was passed for the union of the two Canadian provinces a strong reason existed for withholding the powers which would be conferred by this Bill. At that period great disunion and political confusion prevailed in Canada. A contest had long been prevailing between the French Canadians and the British mercantile party, and these contentions resulted in the rebellion of 1837. In 1838 the Imperial Parliament deprived Lower Canada of the free institutions which that Colony had enjoyed since 1791, and when, in 1840, Parliament was again called upon to legislate for Canada, it was felt necessary to proceed very cautiously with regard to the restoration of free institutions, in consequence of the distrust which existed in the loyalty of a portion of the population. There was, however, no reason at the present time for entertaining the slightest distrust of the Canadian population, and the loyalty of the French Canadians was undoubted. He conceived, therefore, that, as every colony of this country, with the exception of Canada, possessed those powers of dealing with its own legislative institutions which would be conferred by this Bill,

Mr. F. Peel

Parliament could not now hesitate to grant such powers to the Canadian Legislature. In framing this measure the Government had not adopted the recommendations offered by the Canadian Assembly as to the details of the measure. No doubt it was wished that the scheme proposed in the address should have been taken as its basis, and a draft embodying its provisions had been subsequently forwarded by the Canadian Government, but it was judged better to leave the whole question to the Legislature of Canada, and to restrict the scope of the Bill to granting them the power of making the Council elective if they chose to exercise it. It was not improbable that the practical result of the measure would be to make the Council elective, and many persons were apprehensive that the authority of the Crown in Canada might be endangered if both branches of the Legislature became elective. He did not in any degree share those apprehensions; on the contrary, he thought it probable that if the Council were made elective, it might become a more conservative body than it ever was. On referring to the history of the Canadian Legislature, it would be found that the Crown had not, in reality, derived any authority or influence from having the nomination of the Council, and that it had not thereby succeeded in retarding any measure originating with the Assembly which might be supposed to encroach on the authority of the Crown. The Legislative Council had, in fact, been condemned from its commencement. In 1791, Mr. Fox proposed to make it elective, and though this was resisted by Mr. Pitt, yet a time was anticipated when the change would be required, and actually accomplished. In 1828 a Committee of the House of Commons, appointed, on the Motion of Mr. Huskisson, to consider the state of affairs in Canada, which were then complicated by the conflict that had long subsisted between the French and English parties, recommended that the number of nominee members in the Council should be diminished. There was a want of inherent power in its constitution which made it incapable of opposing any effective resistance to the Assembly, and this could only be given to it by making it elective, or at least letting it be understood that its constitution was completely under the control of the colonists themselves. But it was not to be anticipated that the Council should ever become the rival of the Assembly, which would retain in its hands the power of the purse. He would now advert to some circumstances which were said to form a reason why the Bill should not be adopted. The Government of Mr. Hincks, which had held office in Canada since 1848, had recently been defeated in the Assembly, and had advised Lord Elgin to dissolve the Assembly and call a new Parliament. During the last Session two measures had been passed, one raising the numbers of the Assembly from eighty-four to 130, the other giving votes to persons possessed of a very small amount of property. The Canadian Government had not thought it desirable to avail themselves of the power given by the Imperial Act passed last year for settling the question of the clergy reserves until the measure increasing the constituency should be passed; but the Assembly had come to a resolution in favour of dealing with the question immediately. He did not think these circumstances formed any ground why they should not pass the present Bill. It made no difference, as far as this question was concerned, what might be the number of the members of the Assembly, or of the voters who elected it. Differences of opinion might prevail under any circumstances, but the great advantage of the present Bill would be, that, instead of there being a contest between a party in Canada and the Home Government, to withhold a power which the colonists ought to possess, the question would become one between political parties in the colony itself, where its details would be settled. It was further proposed by the Bill to repeal those clauses of the Act of Union of 1791, providing that the Colonial Legislature should not have power to alter the property qualification of its members, that the number of members of the Assembly should not be increased unless a majority of two-thirds in each House concurred in favour of doing so, and that certain Colonial Acts should not be confirmed by the Crown until they should have been laid on the tables of the Houses of Parliament for thirty days. He felt persuaded that the measure, if passed, would give increased steadiness to the course of legislation in the Colony, render the Council a really conservative body, capable of acting as a check or balance to the Assembly, and remove elements of future disturbance from the relations now happily subsisting between the mother country and the British North American Provinces.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he should not shrink from the duty of objecting to the second reading of this Bill in spite of the present discouraging state of the House. He objected to the Bill, first, because it was one sanctioning institutions of an extremely democratic character in the important province of Canada, and secondly, on account of the manner in which it had been brought under the consideration of Parliament by Her Majesty's Government. In the first place the House of Commons was called upon to consider a Bill of this moment for the first time on the 4th of August. He took exception decidedly to the statement of the Duke of Newcastle in another place, and of the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, that this was only a permissive Bill. Had the Canadian Assembly merely requested power to make the Council elective, and had the Bill given only such permission as was given in the case of the Australian Government Bill, it might have been fair to make this statement; but the fact was that the Canadian Government had devised a specific scheme, which in his mind was one of an extreme democratic character. They sent it over for the consideration of the Imperial Government, and then Her Majesty's Ministers brought into Parliament a Bill to enable the Canadian Legislature to carry out that particular plan. To bring forward such a measure at such a date as they had now reached, was a course not decorous or respectful either to that House or to the Canadian Legislature. The Bill had been on the table for five weeks. Why had it not been read a second time before? Why had Government waited so long? It was brought down to that House on Friday, the 30th of June, and this was now Friday, the 4th of August. He had really thought that the Government had considered it wiser, considering what had since taken place in the Colony, to drop the Bill altogether; but very greatly to his surprise, it had again been placed upon the Orders of the Day, after having long disappeared from them. He would put it to the noble Lord the President of the Council whether the Government were acting respectfully either to the House or the Canadian Colonies. Look at the state of the House. [There were at that time some twenty Members on the Government, and about ten on the Opposition benches.] Was that a House in which to introduce a Bill of such importance? Since the Bill came down from the House of Lords, the Legislative Assembly of Canada had been dissolved, because they evinced a determination to deal at once with the great question of the clergy reserves, after themselves virtually admitting that they were not a fair representation of the Canadian people by passing the Act to which the hon. Gentleman alluded, for the extension of the representation. Amongst the papers lately laid on the table he found a despatch from Lord Elgin, expressing an opinion that the attempt to settle such a question in a Parliament which had been already declared by its own vote to be an imperfect representation of the people, was a course of proceeding obviously open to serious objection. He must express strong disapprobation of the course taken by the Duke of Newcastle, as Secretary of State for the Colonies, in reference to this whole subject. The Bill was founded on the address of the Assembly, which, as well as that of the Council, reached this country in the month of July last, and were laid on the table before the end of the Session on the Motion of the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright). He recollected no other instance of such addresses having been laid on the table without the covering despatch, and could only explain the withholding it by the fact of no answer having been sent, or of the answer being of such a nature that Ministers did not choose that it should be known to Parliament. [Mr. FREDERICK PEEL: The despatch was not asked for.] That was, of course, the explanation offered by the Government, but he did not think that that was a sufficient answer, or that the omission of the despatch was justified by the custom of Parliament. He could only account for it in two ways—in the first place the despatch had not been answered; and in the second the Government, he suspected, were not very anxious to let Parliament see that despatch. He had a great respect for Lord Elgin, but the despatch in question was marked by a characteristic for which, on more than one occasion, he had had to find fault with the noble Lord. Its substance was this: "I think the measure most objectionable and surrounded with grave difficulties, but you had better pass it." That was a very convenient course for Lord Elgin, and might relieve him from very great difficulty, but he did not think it would be held very satisfactory to the public either in this country or Canada. It must be a matter of great doubt whether such an elective council as the Bill contemplated would work for the benefit of the people, or consistently with the plan of responsible government established in Canada. He (Sir J. Pakington) considered that the Duke of Newcastle had acted very improperly in not having so much as acknowledged the receipt of that despatch for eleven months. The noble Duke said that, as Lord Elgin was coming to England, he wished to see him personally before replying to the despatch. The noble Duke ought not to have waited for Lord Elgin's arrival; but when his Lordship did come, the noble Duke did not even then answer it. Lord Elgin was here at the beginning of the year, and yet the despatch was not answered till the 26th of May. He appealed to the House whether the noble Duke had treated so important a colony with the respect it deserved? And what had been the result of the noble Duke's conduct? The Assembly—considering, in the words of the old proverb, that silence gave consent—proceeded to draw up the draft of the Bill which they sent over to England for adoption. And even when the noble Duke did answer the despatch, did the House ever see such an answer? It contained four paragraphs. The first two acknowledged the receipt of the two addresses. In the third he stated that the Government intended immediately to introduce a Bill giving the Legislative Council such powers to alter the provisions of the Union Act as would meet the object of the address if the Legislature, on reconsideration, considered it desirable to persevere. In the fourth paragraph, he stated that they would also deal with the law requiring Bills of a certain character to be laid on the table of the House in the same Bill. And this was the answer which, after ten or eleven months' gestation, the noble Duke had produced to satisfy the people of Canada! But he should like to know what the noble Duke meant when he said that he proposed to introduce a Bill to effect the object of "the address," seeing that there were two? After nearly a twelvemonth's interval, at the end of June the Bill was laid upon the table of the House of Lords by the noble Duke, who appeared to think that, as he had taken so much time himself, the Houses of Parliament ought to have as little as possible. The Bill was opposed.

by a noble Earl in a speech of singular ability, and was supported by the noble Duke in a speech characterised by as signal a want of success. The noble Duke said that he (Sir J. Pakington) had also produced a colonial constitution in which the Upper Chamber was an elective one. This was the second time on which he had been invited by the Government to share their responsibility with them, and the construction he put upon this repeated attempt to fix him with complicity in the acts of the Government was, that they were not quite sure that those acts would bear examination; for if they were satisfied with their measures he was afraid the last thing they would think of would be to invite him to share the credit of them. The noble Duke said—

SIR GEORGE GREY rose to order. The right hon. Baronet had alluded to the speech of the Duke of Newcastle on the second reading of the Bill in the House of Lords, and he held in his hand a newspaper which professed to give a report of the debate.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he did not hold in his hand a newspaper, and he had never alluded to the House of Lords.

MR. SPEAKER said, it was very irregular to allude to debates in the House of Lords. The right hon. Gentleman might allude to proceedings in the House of Lords, but not to debates there.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he was always anxious to pay the greatest respect to the decision of the Chair, but in this case he could do no more than render a literal obedience to the ruling of the right hon. Gentleman. He had never named the House of Lords, and he thought it would be an extreme measure to prevent him from doing what he had seen done over and over again. All he would say, therefore, was that the Duke of Newcastle was in error in supposing that he had anything to do with the Cape constitution, that constitution having been drawn by Earl Grey. The only thing which he had to do with that constitution was to write a despatch, in September, 1852, advising that proceedings with respect to it ought to be suspended till the end of the Kafir war. When that war did close, and when he was preparing to consider what course he would take with regard to that constitution, the Government of which he was a Member left office. But he had been very much concerned in the formation of another constitution, namely, that of

New Zealand; and on that occasion he had divided the House against a proposal for an elective Upper Chamber, and had been supported by a large majority. He did not mean to say that he would not, under any circumstances, allow of an elected Upper Chamber, for even in the House of Lords the principle of election was recognised. But he did not see any objection to the principle of a nominated Upper Chamber; on the contrary, he thought it might be made a useful check upon the action of the Legislative Assembly. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Peel) said that the subject had been discussed in New South Wales. During that discussion, Mr. Wentworth—a gentleman who had earned for himself great colonial distinction, and who was certainly not of any aristocratic or high conservative principles—made a very remarkable speech. He said that the two Chambers at the Cape were mere duplicates of each other; and that the effect of the new constitution would be to hand over the Government of the Colony to the vagabond Hottentot party. But even the Cape constitution was not nearly so democratic as that proposed for Canada. The Lower Chamber in Canada it was proposed should be elected for six years, one-third going out every two years; whereas the Lower Chamber at the Cape was elected for ten years, one-half going out every five years. Again, the Cape qualification was an unincumbered real property amounting to 2,000*l.*, or personal property amounting to 4,000*l.*; but in Canada the qualification was to be the simple possession of property to the amount of 1,000*l.* What was this new Council in Canada to do? It was to be elected by the same constituency as the Lower Chamber. That he objected to. The qualification was only to be that the members were to be possessed of property to the amount of 1,000*l.* But there was another and important distinction which he thought highly objectionable, because it struck directly at the independence of the body. It was, that if they exercised their legitimate powers, and refused for two consecutive Sessions to pass the measures which had passed the Lower House, they should be liable to a dissolution. The institutions they were going to sanction were far more democratic even than the institutions of the United States. The most valuable part of the institutions of the United States was the Senate. They were not elected by the same constituency as the Assembly, but by a system of double election, and the result was, that they got a most valuable body of legislators of the highest class; and every one acquainted with the institutions of the United States must be aware of the difference of character which attached to the House of Assembly and to the Senate. Recollect that in America they had not what we call responsible government. The Ministers were independent of the Senate. And recollect the Senate was not liable to dissolution, but they were elected for six years, and during that six years they exercised a veto on the legislation as great as that of the House of Lords. They were not subject, as the proposed Council was in Canada, to be dissolved, if for two years they resisted the more popular assembly. Then there was another change—he meant the facility that was given by this Bill to frequency of changes of institutions in Canada. If Her Majesty's Ministers thought the Canadians were going to establish for themselves a good and sound system of Government, why should they leave that Government exposed to change at any moment on the mere impulse of popular feeling? This was not the course pursued in the United States, where the constitution very wisely provided against hasty changes in the public institutions. The former constitution of Canada guarded against such hasty changes, by requiring the consent of a large proportion of the Legislature to any alterations in the constitution; and he wished to know on what ground this principle had been abandoned? He thought it was impossible that such a constitution as was proposed to be established by this Bill would really effect the great object of a second Chamber—namely, that of establishing a check between the executive power on the one hand, and the popular branch of Legislature on the other. How was it possible that an effective check could exist where the two Chambers were elected by the same constituency, and when the Upper Chamber was liable to dissolution if it resisted for two successive Sessions the will of the Lower Chamber. The opinions expressed by the noble President of the Council (Lord J. Russell) in 1840 were directly in opposition to such an arrangement. He (Sir J. Pakington) thought it was impossible that the system of party government—or, as it was called in the Colonies, responsible government—could be carried on with two Chambers, constituted in the manner proposed by this

If they had two bodies, both claim-

ing to spring from popular election, the one continuing for four years and the other for six years, they might have one House opposing and the other supporting the Executive Government, who, under such circumstances, would find it extremely difficult and embarrassing to carry on the system of responsible government. He also entertained a very strong feeling that, in thus sanctioning by their legislation democratic institutions of this character for the Colonies, they were not really meeting the wishes of the colonists themselves. He did not believe that the colonial subjects of the British empire had any desire for democratic institutions. This question had arisen in New South Wales, where the constitution of the Upper Chamber had been fully discussed by men who were most anxious for the maintenance of public liberty. Since 1844 the colonists of New South Wales had repeatedly urged upon the Government their desire to have certain concessions made to them, and those concessions were ultimately made by the late, and confirmed by the present, Government; but it was required, as a condition of these concessions, that the residents of New South Wales should remodel their constitution. A Committee was appointed by the Legislature of New South Wales to consider and report upon the draught of a constitution, and the feeling of the people was in favour of a nominated Upper Chamber. [Mr. Lowe: No!] That was rather an unusually flat contradiction, but he thought the extract he was about to read would bear him out in what he had just stated. The Committee stated—

“As regards the constitution of the Legislative Council, your Committee consider the House is pledged to a constitution similar in its outline to that of Canada. . . . But the Committee are of opinion that the offer contained in their declaration and remonstrance necessarily includes a nominated Legislative Council in the first instance; and from this offer, independently of the question whether they are strictly bound by it or not, they see no reason to depart. They desire to have a form of government based on the analogies of the British constitution.”

M. de Tocqueville had taken precisely the same view with regard to the constitution that was required for Canada. He believed it would be found that a great proportion of the Canadian people would be unwilling to adopt democratic institutions, or to depart one iota beyond what was unavoidable from the constitution of the mother country. He thought the error which had marked the Canadian policy of the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) was, that it had always had a tendency to elevate that portion of the colonial population who were least attached to the British Crown and to British institutions, at the expense of the most loyal portion of the population, and those who were most anxious to preserve the British connection. He had traced this principle in the noble Lord's policy for many years, and he found it still pursued. He thought the cause of this policy was the mistake which many persons made in confusing democracy with freedom. He would always be prepared to resist and to oppose democracy—he meant, of course, extreme democratic institutions. At the same time he readily acknowledged that the democratic element was one of the greatest blessings this country had ever enjoyed. He held that no country could be free and prosperous without a large infusion of that element; but he believed that, if the principle was pushed too far, and if extreme democratic institutions were adopted, neither the interests of freedom nor the real happiness and welfare of the people would be promoted. He would not advise the Government to oppose what was proved to be the fixed and decided wish of such a population as that of Canada; but he counselled them not to go out of their way to encourage extreme democratic institutions, and to give to such institutions the sanction of the British Parliament. What the colonists desired, and what Parliament was bound to give them, was full power to manage their own affairs. If the Parliament wished to conciliate the affections of the colonists, and to cement their attachment to the Crown of England, let them respect the rights and freedom of the colonial population. He believed that if they offered to our colonists the most democratic and republican institutions, the colonists would reply that they were still the subjects of the Queen of England—that intervening seas had not diminished their attachment to the institutions of their fatherland; and that, adopting the noble language of a distinguished colonial statesman, Mr. Wentworth, they would declare that they rejected the unwelcome boon. He would not call upon the House to go to a division; but he wished to place upon record his entire dissent from the course which the Government had taken upon this subject, because, in his opinion, this Bill would give the sanction of the British Government to the establishment of institutions in Canada which would tend, surely and certainly, to the separation of that Colony from this country, and which, neither before nor after the period of that separation, could possibly conduce to the welfare, the happiness, or the good government of the Canadian people.

Mr. ADDERLEY said, he conceived this Bill was only extending to Canada the same principle which the mother country had recognised and acted upon with respect to other of her colonial possessions, and therefore he considered it was almost a waste of time to prolong the debate. At the same time he wished to express his extreme dissent from the views which had been expressed on this subject by the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Pakington). It appeared to him that the right hon. Gentleman opposed this measure because he objected to the Reform Bill, which had been approved by the Canadians, and that he consequently was in favour of the existing state of things in Canada. But he (Mr. Adderley) would appeal from the right hon. Gentleman's views on that point to those who were smarting from the existing state of things there, and to the wishes of the Canadian people themselves. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman, on what grounds this country could possibly interfere to oppose the wishes of the people of Canada as to a reform in their constitution? He conceived the question before the House was not whether the Reform Bill which was proposed by Canada was a good one or not. Indeed, if there was one fault which the Government had committed in reference to this measure, it was that both in the measure itself, and still more in the debates which had ensued upon it, they had entered into the details of the subject, seeing that they had proceeded on the principle that the Canadians would choose their own constitution. He would submit to the House that the broad question which the House had to consider was, whether this country could insist on a different Reform Bill from that of the Canadians themselves. Could the right hon. Gentleman point to one solitary instance in the history of colonial legislation where a constitution which had been made to order in this country had ever succeeded or taken permanent root in the political institutions of the colony for which it was designed? He (Mr. Adderley) did not believe such an instance was to be found. It would seem that if the right hon. Gentleman was now in power as Colonial Minister, his object would be to suppress the wishes of the Canadian people, and to send out to them a constitution similar to that of the mother country.

SIR J. PAKINGTON said, he must disclaim any such wish, and he could not help complaining that the hon. Gentleman was misrepresenting the arguments he had used.

MR. ADDERLEY: The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think that England had a mission to spread monarchical institutions over all the world. He (Mr. Adderley) believed that during the 200 years in which England had been engaged in colonisation, the result of all its achievements in that way had been to spread as great a variety of political constitutions all over the globe as any nation had done ever since the world began; and the kind of constitution which they had never succeeded in establishing was just that which the right hon. Gentleman was desirous of seeing adopted in Canada. He (Mr. Adderley) would rather say, let us trust to that spirit which loves its own institutions, which goes out with every band of emigrants that leaves this country for our distant dependencies, and which would ever adapt itself to the local circumstance with which it had to deal, and which were but imperfectly understood in this country. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think that it was desirable to imitate the House of Lords in constituting an Upper Chamber for Canada; but he (Mr. Adderley) would tell him that the House of Lords was not so easily imitated. That House sprang from a root the like of which he would not find in the Colonies; there were not materials for the constitution of a Chamber on any such principle in a new colony, where the population was always of an essentially shifting character; and to found anything like an hereditary peerage under such circumstances was absolutely and simply impossible. He contended that a nominated Chamber was a mere duplication of the Crown, and nothing more. He would say, in conclusion, that he was most anxious that nothing should be done which was likely to endanger the connection subsisting between this country and the Colonies; and he would now give notice that, at the very earliest moment of the next Session, he should venture to bring the question before the House, whether it was wise or politic to be going to the separation of the Colonies from this country as a possible contingency.

and whether it was not practicable to draw our distant dependencies into closer connection with the mother country.

MR. HUME said, he could not but express his great satisfaction at the present state of affairs in Canada. Five and twenty years ago he proposed the adoption of the very course which was now being pursued towards that Colony, and everything that had occurred since showed that he was right. Every attempt to counteract the progressive principle had failed. Since representative government was extended to her, Canada had doubled in prosperity, and he had no doubt that her career would continue to be progressive. They were now asked to pass a Bill giving Canada power to alter the existing constitution, and he could not conceive anything more likely to lead to a happy result. The connection between this country and the Colony would last as long as, and no longer than, they made it the interest of the colonists to be associated with them. In the present state of the world they could not expect to keep their dependencies without the tie of interest; but, on the other hand, it was impossible that the colonists could enjoy greater advantages than they possessed in association with England, and with English capital and English protection to assist them. They were now adopting the true mode of making the Colonies of England strong and powerful. He entirely differed from the right hon. Gentleman in his appreciation of the Duke of Newcastle, for, in his opinion, the course pursued by the noble Duke throughout this matter had been in a high degree praiseworthy.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he understood that the right hon. Baronet did not intend to divide the House, and, such being the case, and no Member having supported the right hon. Baronet's views, it was quite unnecessary for him to trespass for more than a few moments on their attention. The right hon. Baronet insisted, as one objection to the Bill, upon the late period of the Session at which it came before the House; but the measure had only been delayed, in common with other business that had come down from the other House, in order to enable the House of Commons to dispose of measures which had to be transmitted to the House of Lords. He would remind the right hon. Gentleman that the Bill had come down to them supported by the sanction of a large majority of the House of Lords, whose support of the measure fully confuted the allegation of the right hon. Baronet that the Duke of Newcastle had not efficiently prepared and advocated its provisions. As to the details of the Bill which had come over from Canada, he held, with the hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Ad-derley), that the House had nothing whatever to do with them, although, from the right hon. Gentleman's speech, it might be supposed that the House was absolutely in Committee upon that measure. The real question before the House was, whether, Canada having made the immense progress she had made in wealth, population, and fitness for self-government, there was any valid reason for withholding from her those privileges which were enjoyed by almost every other British colony of altering her own constitution, with the concurrence and consent of the Crown? Canada was now the only important British colony which did not possess this privilege. Was the House prepared to withhold the concession from Canada? In Australia our colonists knew how to exercise the privileges which Parliament had conferred upon them, and had they any more reason to distrust the Canadian colonists than to distrust the Australians? The right hon. Baronet denounced the contemplated constitution as democratic and republican, but the main point to be considered was the result that would be attained, and not the particular mode by which the Canadians would attain it. The question was, whether by the change proposed the Executive Council would secure that respect and weight and confidence with the people which the nominated Council had failed to secure, or which would enable it to operate more effectually as a real and valid check against inconsiderate popular impulses and hasty legislation? This end obtained, the mode was matter of less moment, and might safely be left to the good sense of the colonists. The feeling of Parliament had long been in this direction, and the effect upon our Australian Colonies and upon our North American Colonies of such principles had been most beneficial. He believed that the change, so far from tending to the separation of our Colonies from the British Crown—a separation which none could more earnestly deprecate than himself—would, on the contrary, tend to cement the attachment of the Colonies to the Crown, and to render the connection between them of far greater interest and value to both. The union of the two provinces and the introduction of a responsible Government under the auspices of Lord Elgin, had already operated most beneficially, had lessened the differences between the two races, and united them in a feeling of warm attachment to the British Crown, and he had the fullest confidence that the present measure would largely tend to strengthen and perpetuate the connection between this country and that Colony which Lord Durham had justly denominated one of the brightest ornaments of the Imperial Crown.

Mr. VERNON SMITH said, he wished to express his entire concurrence in the provisions of the Bill before the House. Whatever might have been the shortcomings of the noble Lord the President of the Council towards the Liberal party in this country, the noble Lord had always been firm to the Liberal party in the Colonies. In one, and only one, respect he concurred with the right hon. Gentleman (Sir John Pakington), namely, in the regret which he felt at the late period of the Session at which the Bill had been brought under their consideration; but that was no reason for objecting to it when it did come. The object of the measure was not to establish a new constitution for Canada, but to remove impediments which had hitherto prevented Canada establishing a constitution for herself, and he thought the Canadian people had shown themselves worthy in every respect of being intrusted with the management of their own institutions.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: At this hour, Sir, I shall not occupy much of the time of the House; but, having introduced the Bill of 1840 for the union of the Canadas, I think it incumbent on me to say that I heartily approve of the present Bill. I think it was advisable to have imposed restrictions at that time; but from the moment the leading men of the Colony were disposed to say that the affairs of the Colony would be better managed by an elective Legislative Council than by a nominee Council, I cannot see what possible interest we can have in preventing them from making the contemplated change. I entirely concur in giving them this power. Whether or not they are wise in asking for it, and whether they will make a wise use of it, are totally different questions. This, however, we do know, that since the Union Act, which I had the honour to introduce, was passed, Canada has made very great progress, and that there can hardly be found anywhere, even among the young communities of the United States, a community in which population and wealth have increased so rapidly, or in which there has been such a great increase of every improvement that accompanies civilisation. With regard to the question of an elective Council, of course the Legislature of Canada will have to consider the difficulties to which they will be exposed. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Pakington) is, I think, not mistaken in saying that it is a totally different experiment from that of the United States. There is certainly a danger with an elective Government and an elective popular Assembly, that the two Legislatures may not agree, and in that event the progress of Government must become exceedingly difficult. The only experiment which I know of the kind has been made in Belgium. It has succeeded hitherto, but once or twice I have watched the progress of Belgium with some anxiety, lest there should be a stop which might seriously injure the prosperity of that country. However, I believe that with regard to this question, as with regard to the clergy reserves, we ought to allow the great province of Canada to consult its own interests. I believe the colonists can judge far better than we can what is for their benefit, and I most readily consent to a Bill by which they will acquire the power.

MR. HENLEY said, it was clear, from the noble Lord's own admission, that he had strong doubts as to the wisdom of the concession which the Canadians had sought. The noble Lord seemed to lay down the principle that what the colonists chose to ask they were entitled to have—a principle which would have operated just as well in 1840; but to his (Mr. Henley's) mind, the strong reason for giving the privilege to Canada was, that it had been given to all our other leading Colonies. He was quite of the opinion that the House had reason to complain of the late period at which this measure had been introduced.

MR. LOWE said, he wished to explain that the reason why he had said "No," when the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Pakington) declared that the people of New South Wales were in favour of a nominated Upper Chamber was, that the people had petitioned against such a Chamber from every town and district of that Colony.

MR. F. SCOTT said, he also must complain of the late period of the Session at which so important a measure had been introduced to the notice of the House. It was urged as an excuse for having brought the Bill forward at so late a period of the Session as the present, that the Government had to introduce a number of other important measures. But what, he would ask, were those important measures? None had been passed in the present Session which could justify the Government in having recourse to the excuse to which he had just adverted. He objected also in the strongest manner to the opinion which had been expressed by the right hon. Baronet the Colonial Secretary, that the House ought to agree to the Bill, because it had received the assent of the House of Lords. But such a recommendation of a Bill, whatever might be its value at any other time, was of far less force with respect to the present Bill, when it was well known that, had its consideration been delayed but a few days, the intelligence received from Canada would have been of such a nature as most materially to affect the decision at which the House of Lords had arrived on the subject. The Bill appeared to him to be mainly founded on the recommendation of the Legislative Assembly of Canada. But no importance could be attached to the opinion of that Assembly, for the Governor General had thought proper to dissolve the body, because it had proved itself unable, in his opinion, to deal satisfactorily with even minor and far less important matters. The right hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. V. Smith), when speaking of the advantages of this Bill, had said that it would be of the greatest possible utility, as giving a second Chamber to the Colony, which would check the action of the Lower Chamber. But no great value could be attached to such an argument, inasmuch as this new Chamber was to be formed actually of the ingredients of which the Lower Chamber was constituted. He was surprised that the Ministers of a monarchical Government should suggest to a colony the adoption of a plan which would establish a second Chamber not even possessing the same check which existed in the case of the neighbouring republic—that they should propose, in fact, a measure more democratic than that of a republic. It had been said also that the Colonies should be looked at with a possible view to their ultimate separation from this country. But if that were so, was it not the duty of this country to give them monarchical institutions, and endeavour so to establish those institutions, that when the Colonies were separated, they might become distinct monarchies rather than rival republics, for the larger the number of republics which existed in what were now our Colonies, the greater would be the danger to the monarchy at home? He therefore protested in the strongest manner against passing a measure of this kind at the present period of the Session, and without that amount of discussion and careful consideration which its importance required.

Mr. BIGGS said, he felt greatly obliged to the Government for having brought forward this Bill; for he believed that a greater piece of practical statesmanship had never yet passed the Legislature of this country. The House might depend upon it that if it did not legislate and keep pace with the growing wants and opinions of the colonies, our valuable Canadian possessions would be alienated from us and thrown into the arms of the United States. He knew of no measures more likely to bring about this result than the stringent forms of Government advocated by hon. Members on the opposite side of the House. This Bill was nothing more than a proper concession to the colony of Canada, and, if passed, he believed it would ensure peace and the most beneficial results. He believed that the Bill, if passed, as he was sure it would be by an overwhelming majority, would form a most interesting bond of union between the colony and the mother country, would produce an immense amount of good feeling, and would increase the loyal attachment of the colonists to the Crown.

Question put, and agreed to.

USURY LAWS REPEAL BILL.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Mr. CAYLEY said, it was his intention to move that the House resolve itself into Committee upon this Bill that day month. He must complain that the Bill had been introduced at this late period of the Session without any preliminary inquiry, and without any full and clear exposition of its grounds; and he maintained that there were many reasons why they should not proceed in this hasty manner to deal with a question of so much importance. This was not the first time that the same question had been brought under the attention of the House. There was an idea, after 1825, that in the panic which occurred in that year the commercial interests might have got money directly from legitimate resources, at a more reasonable rate of interest, if the usury laws had been repealed as regarded bills of exchange. An inquiry took place preceding the renewal of the Bank Charter Act, in 1832, and the Committee decided that it would be expedient to repeal the usury laws as far as regarded bills of exchange of three months and under. In 1833, a Bill was passed to that effect; but in 1836 another commercial panic took place, and in 1837 a Bill was passed to extend the law of 1833 to bills of exchange of twelve months and under. The question was again raised by Lord Lansdowne in 1841, upon which occasion the late Lord Ashburton stated that the relaxation of the usury laws had been of great benefit to the lender, but had not conferred an equal advantage upon the borrower. A Select Committee was then appointed to consider the subject, and that Committee reported in 1842, but refused to declare any opinion. The parties called before that Committee were all of them persons connected with the moneyed interest, with the exception of Mr. Cooke, of the firm of Truman and Cooke, large dealers in Mincing Lane, and of Mr. Graham, an official assignee connected with the Court of Bankruptcy. Mr. Cooke stated that in his view the relaxation of the usury laws had been extremely favourable to the capitalist, but extremely detrimental to the borrower, and he therefore considered that it had operated very badly. Mr. Graham declared that the relaxation of the usury laws had raised the rate of interest to those parties who had afterwards become bankrupts, or, in other words, to the most needy persons. But that was not all. In his evidence before the Committee which sat in 1847, Mr. Horsley Palmer, who had been Governor of the Bank of England, and who had recommended the Bill of 1844, which the Committee was then considering, stated that he had never known such fluctuations in the rate of interest and discount as had taken place since the passing of the Bill of 1844, and his statement was corroborated by Mr. Cotton and Mr. Tooke. Now, if the laws as regarded money were more free, it would be quite fair to contend that the capitalist should be at liberty to deal with his commodity as he might think fit, though reasonable doubts might be suggested whether money, considering all the functions it had to perform, did not differ somewhat widely from every other kind of property. But the laws as regarded money were not free. The monetary laws of this country were based upon the most restrictive system; and he must contend, from the evidence taken before the Committee of 1847, that the great commercial panic of that year did not arise from the operation of any natural law, but from the operation of artificial restrictions, invented and applied by the Legislature. Mr. Samuel Gurney stated before the Committee that the scarcity of money in 1847 was artificial and not real, and was caused by the absurd and whimsical provisions of the Bank Act of 1844. What was the House now asked to do? Why, it was asked to extend the system of legislation which was now connected only with bills of exchange and promissory notes to all transactions as regarded land. He maintained, however, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had no right to put the landed interests into the same category with the unrestricted moneyed interests, until he had altered the laws which created artificial periods of scarcity and of pressing demands for money. The natural tendency of money was to become cheaper, and if Acts of Parliament, and not the natural laws of money, produced those periods of scarcity, they had no right to make the rate of interest free until they took the present restrictions away from money. Until they had reduced the expenses of the transfer of landed securities, it would be most unfair to put the poor yeoman or country shopkeeper in the same category with those the transfer of whose securities cost a mere trifle. The proposed repeal of the usury laws might suit the interests of Lombard Street, Threadneedle Street, and St. Swithin's Lane, but it did not necessarily follow that it would equally suit the interests of the commercial, manufacturing, and shop-keeping community, or that it would be equally advantageous to the landed, railway, and mortgage interests. The present Bill would most injuriously affect rail debentures and mortgages to a most enormous extent. They ought to make money free, if they made interest free, or if they kept money restricted, which was the effect of the Act of 1844, they ought to keep interest restricted.

The system now in operation was which produced, by Act of Parliament those periodical periods of scarcity which drove the industrial interests to Lombard Street for relief. Augustus was said to have found Rome brick and left it marble. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had found Lombard Street a limited monarchy, and he seemed to desire to leave it a grinding despotism.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day month, resolve itself into the said Committee," instead thereof.

MR. HUME said, he agreed with his hon. Friend (Mr. Cayley) that any restriction, such as that imposed by the measures of 1844 and 1845, must be attended with unalloyed evils. His hon. Friend had spoken of the effect of the usury laws upon landed property; but had he forgotten that the witnesses examined before the Committee, of which he was a member, proved that the usury laws subjected landed proprietors to a rate of interest of occasionally as much as ten per cent? Before that Committee, and before the Committee of the House of Lords, the bulk of evidence showed it would be most beneficial to have free trade in money; and he hoped the time was not far distant when every one would believe as he believed, that, as in sugar and coffee, so in gold, individuals should be left to buy in open market at the current prices, without legislative interference. However, the subject was one that required great consideration, and upon that ground probably it would be better that the discussion should be postponed till next year, when the monetary question would be brought fully before the House.

MR. WILKINSON said, that these usury laws were originally intended to benefit the landed interest exclusively; but they could not any more regulate the price of money in the market than they could the price of hay or any other article of commerce; neither could they compel persons to lend their money, whether they would or not, at any fixed rate of interest.

MR. MALINS said, that the usury laws having been repealed as regarded personal securities, it would be perfectly ridiculous to attempt to reimpose them. But how stood the case between land and personal property? If a person deposited a quantity of sugar or coffee as a security for a loan of money, the lender of that money might legally take 40 per cent interest for its use; but, as the law now stood, if a person lent a sum of money on security of land, it would be illegal for him to receive more than 5 per cent interest. If he sought to recover more, the contract would be vitiated. The question then resolved itself into a distinction between the two kinds of property, personal and landed property. Was it right to make that distinction? Now he wanted to know whether it afforded any protection to the owners of land? So far from it, he believed it to be a great detriment and a great injury to the land, because the value of property depended much on its facility of transference from one to another. In consequence of the state of the law they had money panics, and the rate of interest had run up, within the last forty-eight hours, to $5\frac{1}{2}$ minimum. They knew that in 1847 the minimum of the rate of interest was 8 per cent. When money was suddenly wanted, and the borrower had nothing but land to offer as a security, by the law that was the worst description of property that could be held, because it was illegal for the owner of that land to give more than 5 per cent for the money, while, if the same party had had goods, he could have got money readily, being at liberty to give whatever rate of interest might be required of him. The lenders of money turned away from land, and lent their money on personal security at 8 and 10 per cent. So far, therefore, from benefiting land by these usury laws, they imposed a great injury upon it; they rendered it the least available of any species of property in the money market when the professed object of the law was to make it the most available. So far, therefore, from conferring any boon upon the landowner by these laws, they were putting restrictions upon him. It was said by the hon. Member for the North Riding of Yorkshire (Mr. Cayley) that this measure would be very detrimental to the small landholders. He confessed he was unable to see that. The small landowner either got his money or not; if his security were available he got it, if it were not available he did not. It was quite a mistake to suppose that land was the only available security. He had himself been engaged in a case where a young man had, upon personal security, given 30 per cent interest, and to which the Court of Equity saw no objection, since the Legislature had established the law that upon personal security, unaccompanied by a deposit of deeds relating to landed property, the parties were at liberty to make what contract they pleased. The result of his experience and of his observation in his profession was, that instead of the proposed change in the law doing any injury to the land, it would confer a great benefit upon it. Any measure which assimilated the law affecting real and personal property was, in his opinion, a good law, and therefore he gave his most cordial support to the present measure. It would have the effect of doing away with a great many lawsuits in cases where money had been borrowed, and in which no questions could possibly have arisen if land security had not formed a portion of the transaction.

Mr. SPOONER said, he objected in the first place most particularly, to the time at which the Bill had been brought forward. At this late period of the Session it was utterly impossible the subject could receive that attention which its importance required. In the second place, he objected to the Bill because it was intended to alter that which had been the established law for a very considerable time, and that in so altering it they would affect bargains which had been made under the existing law, which could not be done without inflicting injury on some persons who were parties to those bargains. He was apprehensive that the proposed change of the law would very seriously injure one class of persons—he meant the small landholders throughout the country. They had purchased their property on certain terms, and had borrowed money for the purpose of effecting the purchase on certain terms. Now, what would be the effect of this law upon them? There were in all parts of the country solicitors who, as soon as this law came into effect, would say to their clients who had lent the money to these freeholders, “You see that the value of money is raised by this new law, and you must raise the interest on the money you have advanced to these persons, and not be content with 5 per cent.” He had no doubt that a great deal of this sort of thing would go on among the smaller holders of land in this country. Upon that ground, therefore, he objected to the Bill. Again, who, he would ask, had called for this Bill? Had the necessity for making such a great change been proved? On the contrary, the measure was totally unasked for, and was altogether a voluntary change from a system which had lasted for many years. He considered it dangerous at any time to make these changes, but more especially so at the present moment, when they were in a state of war, and when it was impossible at any one moment to know what would be the state of the money market or the rate of interest. By this measure they would subject a large body of persons who were now exempt from those changes, without notice, to become liable to all the influences and fluctuations which would necessarily take place in the money market when the provisions of the Bill came into operation.

MR. HENLEY said, he considered that, as the small landed proprietors almost invariably paid the full rate of interest, that rate would be increased if this Bill were passed. There had been many transactions on the faith of the interest on land not being greater than 5 per cent, especially in the case of members of freehold land societies, and the repeal of these laws would, therefore, injuriously affect those persons.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

In reply to a request from Mr. CAYLEY, to make the Bill experimental, by limiting its operation to two years,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, after the experiments they had already had, and after the cautious manner in which the change had been introduced with respect to other securities, he thought the time was come to take a decisive step, either to confirm or abolish these laws. This Bill would tend to promote freedom of trade in money, and as it had been unanimously passed by the House of Lords, without objection or alteration, he confessed he should be very sorry to see anything done which might have the effect of interrupting the House of Lords in that career, and which would do no credit to that House.

House resumed. Bill reported.

PUBLIC HEALTH BILL.

House in Committee.

MR. APSLEY PELLATT said, he wished for some information as to the new head of the department, because the efficient working of the machinery of the present Bill would depend very much upon the person who might be appointed to carry it out. He also wished to know whether the "small pipe" system of drainage was to be continued, and what influence the persons named in the Bill as constituting, with the President, "the General Board of Health," would exercise over the President himself.

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH said, the constitution of the Board of Health, under this Bill, would be precisely that of other second class departments. There would be a President, who would be solely responsible for the administration of the Board, and there would be, besides the President, certain ex officio members, who, however, would have nothing to do with the business of the department, and whose only use would be, in the event of the absence of the President from London, or of his inability from any cause to attend to the business of his office, to do any ministerial act which might be required on an emergency. With respect to the question of pipe drainage, as the drainage of the metropolis was not at present under the General Board of Health, that Board pronounced no opinion whatever upon it. With respect to the gentleman who might be appointed hereafter to the office of President of the Board of Health, he could not be expected to answer his hon. Friend's question, for he really did not know. He hoped, however, and was convinced, that it would be a person of whom his hon. Friend would approve.

MR. EVELYN said, he must complain that, while the defects in the existing law in reference to the public health had been admitted by Her Majesty's Government, and legislation on the subject had been promised, nothing had yet been done. They were now told that there was to be an inquiry next Session. So they were told always. Everything was postponed to that shadowy period, and in the existing Session nothing whatever was done. Would the grievances of which the people had complained be in the least remedied by this Bill. One of those grievances was that the present Act was long and unintelligible. Would that be improved by the measure now before the House? So far from that, it would be made worse, for those who wished to know the law, would have to study this Bill also, and there would thus be a code of health extending to 162 sections. Another grievance was, that there was no scrutiny established, so as to test the bonâ fides of the signatures to the petitions which were sent up for the application of the Act. That also was left untouched. Another grievance was, that the law was not of universal application—that it was not brought into operation in every town and village in the country, but was applied only where the General Board of Health thought proper. The result was, in many cases, a great depreciation of property, for the moment a town was placed under the Board of Health, there was a rumour that some pestilence prevailed there. It was a grievance also that local self-government was preserved only in appearance, for the 119th section of the Bill placed the whole of the local boards completely under the control of the General Board, so that they could not stir hand nor foot—could neither levy a rate nor even appoint a surveyor—without the consent of that Board, which made what terms with them it pleased, and thus an engineering monopoly was created, most injurious to the sanitary improvement of the country. None of these evils had been redressed, or were proposed to be redressed, by this Bill. He thought the members of the local boards should be responsible, not to the General Board, but to the inhabitants of the district for which they were appointed to act. He considered the proposal of the Board of Health in reference to the water supply of the metropolis anything else than adequate for the purpose required, and he should conclude by expressing a hope that the inquiry which was promised next Session would lead to some better result than the addition of another to the number of Parliamentary “blue books.” It would be well to give a careful consideration to the common law as bearing upon these subjects, and to see whether, by declaring the common law, allowing it to be carried out, and supplying what was defective, they might not do better than they had done hitherto.

Mr. MICHELL said, that the Bill gave the Board too much power over the local officers. Another objection was that it did not give power over the City of London. The deaths from cholera had increased from twenty six to 133 last week. He had no doubt the increase took place from this cause. The mud and filth which was caused after rain was swept up into heaps, where it was left to evaporate. When dry it became pulverised, and was again spread over the metropolis. Now, evaporation could not take place from those heaps without carrying with it malaria, and this was one of the frightful sources of cholera and other diseases. Some people thought a dirty state of the streets was healthy. He was told by a lady that fogs were good for health, but he did not believe it. In no other city or metropolis, except London, were the streets swept by beggars, not even in Dublin, which was the land of beggars. Then, again, the graveyards in the metropolis were most prejudicial to health. Westminster Hall and that House received such a smell from the opposite graveyard of St. Margaret's that there was sometimes no bearing it. The state of things was worst at night, and the untrapped gratings added to the evil. Any one who walked over St. Margaret's might see holes for the rats and dogs. He put his umbrella into some of them. He measured the size of some, and found them to be eight inches by sixteen [Laughter.] This might be a laughing matter now, but they would not laugh when the cholera came home to them. On this very day there were nineteen deaths from cholera. The greatest number of deaths occurred in the filthiest part of the town. He had, therefore, felt it to be his duty to state these things to the House.

SIR GEORGE PECHELL said, it was right that the new Board should be made aware of the system which had been practised by the old Board, and of the feelings of the public with regard to its proceedings. It had been said that provisional orders, such as the old Board had issued, and which he considered inexpedient, were less expensive to the ratepayers than local Acts; but the local Acts which had been referred to in support of that proposition, such as the Brighton Act and the St. Pancras Paving Act, had nothing to do with the question. The expense of sending a man down merely to take a survey of Brighton previous to a provisional order had been 198*l.* During the last five years the Board had incurred very great, and, as he considered, unnecessary expenses, and had only applied the Act to a comparatively small number of places. He admitted that the principle of the present Bill was received with almost universal favour, but hoped that some inquiry would take place in order to show the new Board the faults which the old one had fallen into, so that it might avoid them. No town ought to be brought under the operation of an Act so stringent as that of 1848 without ascertaining the sense of a bonâ fide majority of its inhabitants; but if the present system of bringing it under the control of the Board on the petition of one-tenth of the number was to remain, no place would be safe.

Mr. PHILIPPS said, he believed that a petition signed by one-tenth of the inhabitants of a place could be got up for or against any subject, especially if the names of the persons signing the petition were not to be verified, and, in his opinion, no town ought to be bound by such a minority.

MR. COBBETT said, that all the petitions presented to that House, complaining of the conduct of the Board of Health, asked for an inquiry into the circumstances of their being brought under its operation, and alleging, at the same time, that it had been by deceptive means. He wished to have a complete understanding from the right hon. Baronet the First Commissioner of Works, as far as could be given, that the measure, during the year it would be in force, would not be brought into operation in any particular town unless the petition for it was genuine, and was signed by a majority of the ratepayers, and also that before any permanent measure was passed, it should be referred to a Committee of Inquiry upstairs.

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH said, he must remind the hon. Gentleman that the Bill was not to amend the Public Health Act, but to constitute a new Board, and it would be extremely awkward for him to make any statement affecting the manner in which towns ought to be brought under the operation of the Public Health Act. All he could say was, that when provisional orders for such a purpose were brought into that House, it had always been his principle not to ask the House to confirm them where a decided majority of the ratepayers opposed the introduction of the Act, and he had no reason to suppose that that principle would be departed from. With regard to the other question, it would be the duty of the President of the new Board to propose a Bill next Session for the amendment of the Public Health Act, which would, no doubt, be referred to a Committee, and witnesses examined on it.

LORD DUDLEY STUART said, he believed that very unhealthy exhalations arose from the water in some of the parks. In particular he was informed that on very still nights there was a very unpleasant smell from the water of the Serpentine; that the sentries on duty often complained on the subject, and that the inhabitants of the houses in the immediate vicinity, in Bayswater and Westminster, were frequently obliged to close their windows. He was further told that this smell was caused by a great quantity of putrescent mud which lay at the bottom of the water, and that the evil might be removed by cleansing out the mud and introducing fresh supplies of water in the form of a continuous running stream.

SIR GEORGE PECHELL said, he was ready to admit that the First Commissioner of Works had been opposed to provisional orders being confirmed for putting the Public Health Act into force in towns where its introduction was opposed by the inhabitants; but he must yet complain that after such an expression of opinion in towns, the Board of Health should have insisted in putting them in the provisional orders in question.

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Clause 3 (Salary of the President of the new Board to be 2,000*l.* a year).

MR. HENLEY said, he must object to the amount, as too large; he thought 1,500*l.* sufficient; he would not, however, divide the Committee on the question.

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH said, the President's tenure would not extend beyond that of the existing Government; for which reason the salary was fixed at a larger amount than it otherwise would be. The duties, too, were of a highly responsible nature, and even in that point of view he did not consider 2,000*l.* a year excessive.

SIR GEORGE PECHELL said, he would point out that the salary of the new President greatly exceeded that of a Lord of the Admiralty, who worked exceedingly hard, being engaged morning, noon, and night. He hoped, considering the amount of the salary, that the work would be well done.

MR. HEYWOOD said, he did not consider that the proposed salary was too much, as the duties of his office would occupy the whole time of the new President.

Clause agreed to, as were clauses up to Clause 8 inclusive.

Clause 9.

MR. HENLEY said, he doubted whether Mr. Chadwick's length of service had been such that he ought to be laid upon the shelf if anything presented itself upon which he could be employed. Mr. Chadwick had in many respects rendered considerable service, and might again be employed in the public service.

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH said, he fully agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that Mr. Chadwick ought to be employed again in the public service if possible.

Clause agreed to, as were the remaining clauses.

House resumed.

Bill reported, as amended.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE (No. 2) BILL.

Order for Committee read; House in Committee.

Further progress resumed at Clause 4.

MR. DIGBY SEYMOUR said, he hoped the Bill would not be advanced further; for, looking to its principle and the manner in which it was drawn, it did not reflect any credit on legislation. It was, besides, unnecessary, as it professed to give a more summary process for recovery of sums due on bills of exchange when the process under the existing law was sufficiently rapid. Many of its details were also very objectionable. He objected also to the proposed registry, as well as to the provision which took away the conduct of process under the Bill from attorneys, and vested it entirely in notaries. It also created this anomaly—that whereas the provisions of the Bill affected Ireland and Scotland, as well as England, a person in Scotland or Ireland defending a suit must come to this country for the purpose of doing so; He found that there were sixty-two Amendments by hon. and learned Friends of his, which alone was a proof of the imperfection of the Bill, and was an additional reason why no attempt should be made to pass it this Session. There was another reason for delaying this Bill. It proposed to give a more summary process for execution on bills than now existed; and it was the opinion of several gentlemen, whose opinions were of weight, that it should be accompanied by some measure which dealt with fraudulent transactions in bills of exchange. Such a Bill he had introduced in May last, and, after long delays, it had received a third reading that evening; but, in consequence of the Resolution passed by the other House it had no chance of becoming law this Session. He thought that the two Bills ought to go together, and if one of them was to be cast into the limbo of next Session, the other ought to accompany it. He should, therefore, move that the Chairman do leave the Chair.

MR. GEACH said, he thought it undesirable that the House should legislate without further inquiry. The operation of this Bill upon the small tradesmen and shopkeepers of the provinces, who might fall into temporary difficulty, would be to drive them into irretrievable bankruptcy.

There were abundant means of recovering bills of exchange; there might, he would allow, be vexatious pleas, but they were, he believed, very few. He objected more particularly to the Bill because it gave a great advantage to holders of these bills over every other kind of debt. The effect would be, that it would be impossible that any creditor, with a due regard to his own interest, should show any forbearance, because he would not know whether, if he did not put the law into force, the next creditor who had a bill backed would exercise the same forbearance. He thought the Government ought not to give their aid to a Bill of this kind not introduced by themselves, and ought not to back it up with the majority at their command. He begged, therefore, to support the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Sunderland (Mr. D. Seymour).

MR. MASSEY said, he also should support the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Sunderland. This Bill had a very important effect upon the law of bankruptcy, because it seemed to him that it affected very deeply and very closely the law of fraudulent preference. The main cardinal policy of our bankruptcy law was to effect an equal distribution in the property of the bankrupt among the whole body of his creditors; but if you passed a Bill of this sort, which favoured one species of security, enabling the holder of that security to realise immediately his debt, you induced every powerful creditor to come down upon his debtor, and to insist upon his giving bills. Possessed of these bills, the creditor would immediately realise them; he would seize upon the property of the debtor, and would thus, in point of fact, obtain a fraudulent preference. Now, he thought it was too much to expect the House, at this period of the Session, to consider the provisions of a Bill which went to change the whole bearing of the bankruptcy law of this country, and which would affect persons in almost every condition in life. Without saying, therefore, that it might not be expedient, at some future time, to provide a more summary remedy for the recovery of money upon bills of exchange, he was certainly of opinion that this measure went too far, and that its provisions were too crude to meet with their approval.

MR. MUNTZ said, he looked upon this as one of the most unjust and oppressive Bills that ever was introduced into that House, and for his part saw but one reason for bringing it forward, which was to create a job. Somebody or other, no doubt, wanted to appoint a registrar. Who wanted this Bill, and who asked for it? There was no difficulty now in recovering upon these bills of exchange, but this measure would make anybody liable in six days to be made a bankrupt if he did not take up his bill. It was one of the grossest jobs ever attempted to be palmed upon the public, and he should certainly, therefore, support the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. D. Seymour).

SIR ERSKINE PERRY said that, so far from the Bill having been got up in a hole or corner, it had emanated from several influential public meetings held in the greatest seats of commerce in this country—such as London, Leeds, Liverpool, Manchester, and Bradford. These meetings were universally in favour of obtaining a more summary remedy on bills of exchange than at present existed. In consequence of those meetings, the bankers of the City of London formed themselves into a body, and it was from them that the Bill emanated. The measure had passed through as severe an ordeal as it could undergo; it had passed through a Select Committee of the House of Lords, attended by the law lords, who were unanimous in thinking it was a measure which was sound in principle, and which would be a valuable addition to the English law. The Bill merely proposed to effect this—that, whereas by the law of England at present, a person was enabled to set up false defences with regard to bills of exchange which set the creditor at defiance for months, these false defences were now prevented and a summary remedy provided. The object of the Bill was to prevent any debtor, who had got no defence whatever, from interposing any delay between himself and his creditor. Was this a reasonable principle for the Legislature to act upon? The Bill had no doubt met with legal opposition, but he had been occupied with law reforms for many years, and he found that the lawyers were not, as a body, favourable to law reforms. This was certainly not an attorney's Bill, and it would most probably have the effect of diminishing the business of attorneys upon bills of exchange. Was it not a good end to aim at, to enable parties to call in the assistance of a court of law in the most speedy and economical manner possible? The Bill was not the visionary creation of some theorist, but it followed the example of one of the most practical countries in the world—namely, Scotland—where it had worked most beneficially for 150 years. The same summary process was also in operation in every commercial country in Europe. At the same time, if the Committee should think fit to reverse the resolution which was come to by the House the other day, he was prepared to bow to their decision, and kiss the rod with humility.

MR. JAMES MACGREGOR said, he must contend that the practice as to bills of exchange in Scotland was not adapted to the circumstances of this country. The system of banking there was quite different to that here. In Scotland a paper currency prevailed, banking was carried to a great extent, and bills of exchange did not circulate as they did in England. They were absorbed by the banks, which endeavoured to replace them by £ notes. It was the paper of the banks which passed from hand to hand, and not tradesmen's bills of exchange. The trade of a country like England could not be carried on upon the stringent principles which this Bill laid down. When the great convulsion took place in our commerce with the United States, if a process like that provided in this Bill had been adopted, no one could tell the ruin that would have been produced, or where it would have stopped. The commerce of the country he felt assured did not require such a measure; and if meetings had been held in its favour in different commercial cities, the parties who agreed to it ought to be stated, that they might be known. If the Bill was to be proceeded with, it ought, at all events, to be referred to a Select Committee.

MR. GLYN said, the Bill had not been introduced without the concurrence or knowledge of the mercantile body—indeed, the subject had occupied the attention of the mercantile world for some time past. The principle of the Bill was good, but he could not help thinking that the scope and tendency of it were not sufficiently known, and he should, therefore, recommend the hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill to accept the expression of feeling on the part of the Committee as an evidence that suitable legislation at the proper time would meet with proper consideration.

SIR ERSKINE PERRY said, after what had occurred he should be sorry to take up the time of the Committee by proceeding further with the Bill, and therefore with the permission of the Committee he would assent to the Chairman reporting progress, with a view of withdrawing it for the present.

MR. CAIRNS said, he thought that, under the circumstances, the advice of the hon. Member for Kendal (Mr. Glyn) was extremely sound. The Scottish principle of summary execution appeared to him unobjectionable; and he hoped that some time or other it would become law in a carefully considered measure. He would suggest, however, that the question should be taken up by the Government.

MR. HENLEY said, the vice of the Bill was, that it would inflict more inconvenience on trade than was foreseen; as the supporters, keeping but one object in view, lost sight of the inconvenience of issuing executions against every man who did not take up his bills at once. The matter was of much importance, and required great consideration, and though it was said that meetings had been held in favour of the Bill in several great towns, yet it did not appear that much benefit had been derived to the discussion from the circumstance, as several of the representatives of the largest towns were evidently against the Bill. He thought as the measure did not appear to be well understood, it would be by far the wisest course to postpone it.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, the mercantile community of the City of London certainly did petition in favour of the Bill, and a great meeting had been held in its favour. The decision to which the hon. Gentleman had come—namely, to postpone the Bill—was the right one. Judging from the opposition likely to arise, both to the principle and some of the details, it did not appear possible that the Bill could go through the House that Session. But he thought the principle of the Bill ought not to be condemned, and he hoped the Chairman would be allowed to report progress, and that would only be postponing the Bill for this Session.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, the Bill had been approved of by practical persons in England, and by a Scotch lawyer of eminence, Lord Campbell. It was monstrous that a man entering into a negotiable contract, such as a Bill of exchange, could put another man, to whom he agreed to pay a specific sum of money on a particular day, to the delay of several weeks, even when he had no real defence to set up. He was surprised that any mercantile man could oppose the introduction of the law of summary jurisdiction. He had no doubt had the hon. Member (Sir E. Perry) gone to a division he would have carried his measure two to one. He hoped the hon. Gentleman would introduce a similar Bill next Session, not only for England, but for Ireland.

MR. MURROUGH said, he objected to the Bill because it was uncalled for, and bore the stamp of amateur rather than practical legislation. It had been said that this was not an attorney's Bill; but he doubted it, for as the law now stood, judgment might be got in an undefended action in sixteen days at a trifling expense, whatever might be the amount of the Bill, but this would not be the case if the measure passed. The Bill was not fitted for the meridian of this country, and every practical man knew it would not work.

MR. MALINS said, he also must enter his protest against the Bill, as there was in the law as it now stood abundant means of recovering upon Bills of exchange. He had heard great complaints of the Bill, and had been requested by many commercial traders to oppose it. The remedies were ample, and the Bill was objectionable in principle and in detail. He was glad, therefore, it was disposed of.

BANKRUPTCY BILL.

House in Committee.

Clause 1.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he wished to point out that a great reduction might be made in the present number of Commissioners and Registrars in the Court of Bankruptcy, which was much greater than the amount of business required. There was no reason why there should be five Commissioners in London with salaries of 2,000*l.*, and five Registrars at 1,000*l.* a year. The whole amount of salaries paid in the Court of Bankruptcy was 59,795*l.*; besides this, 21,879*l.* was paid for compensations, 2,600*l.* for annuities, and 6,316*l.* for expenses; making in all 90,590*l.* He thought it would be a great benefit to the country generally, if all these Commissionerships and other offices were abolished, and the business thrown into the county courts. The Judges there were perfectly competent to undertake it, and in most instances their time was not now fully occupied. By this means, too, a saving in the country would be effected of the 50,795*l.* at present paid in salaries in the Court of Bankruptcy.

MR. GLYN said, the question of throwing the business of the Court of Bankruptcy into the county courts had been carefully considered by the Commission which had lately sat to consider the subject of the bankrupt laws, but the result to which they came was, that the business of the Bankruptcy Court was entirely unsuited for the county courts, and that the proposition could not be advantageously carried out. He admitted that the expenses of the Bankruptcy Courts were very high, and would still remain so even after the present Bill was passed. The present measure did indeed embody several important suggestions which were made by the Commission of last year. It was, however, but a small instalment of what must hereafter be done for the reform of these courts. For instance, it removed many of the obnoxious penal provisions which the present bankrupt law contained, and it gave the Lord Chancellor and Lords Justices power from time to time to introduce regulations with a view to the reduction of the cost of bankruptcy proceedings.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that perhaps it would be satisfactory to the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. W. Williams) if he informed him that the present Bill was a mere sectional part of a projected reform in the whole law of bankruptcy. The question was connected with the important inquiry into the best method to be employed for the consolidation of the Statute law.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that the present Bill admitted that there was no necessity for more than one Commissioner in country districts, and he did not understand why five Commissioners and five Registrars should be required for London.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he thought that when a vacancy occurred, that would be the proper time for bringing on the question as to whether or not it should be filled up. It would be unreasonable to expect that any of the learned gentlemen now holding those offices should be deprived of his office because the business of the Court of Chancery had fallen off.

MR. MURROUGH said, he was of opinion that there never was a greater mistake committed than the appointment of the country Commissioners. It was a notorious fact that the large body of creditors resided in London, or in the large towns, and the greatest inconvenience had been caused to them by the local courts of bankruptcy. To transfer the business in bankruptcy to the county courts would, he thought, be to commit as great an error as was committed when the county Commissioners were appointed.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he thought that some provision ought to be introduced into the Bill to diminish the number of Commissioners and Registrars in London when any vacancy should occur.

Clause agreed to, as were also the remaining clauses.

MR. MURROUGH said, he would now move to insert in the Bill the following words—

“ In order to facilitate the proof of debts, the Lord Chancellor may, by order, appoint one or more of the ushers of the Court of Bankruptcy in London, or any usher of any district Court of Bankruptcy, a Commissioner or Commissioners for the purpose of administering oaths or taking affirmations for the proof of debts in such courts respectively.”

He thought it desirable that when the Commissioners were engaged in the despatch of the regular business of the Court, their attention should not be distracted by the necessity of administering in open Court oaths to a number of individuals, who might with great convenience be sworn by one of the ushers.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he thought it important to administer oaths with the greatest possible solemnity, in order to secure respect for them; but to allow a mere servant—for such the usher was—to administer the oaths, would assuredly be regarded as a degradation of the function. There was, however, no necessity for legislation on the subject, as by a recent alteration of the law all solicitors in bankruptcy were made special Commissioners, and could receive affidavits.

MR. MURROUGH said, that the circumstance of a solicitor being enabled to receive affidavits out of Court did not meet the case he had in view, which was that of a vast number of witnesses appearing in open Court and requiring to be sworn. With regard to the objection that the usher was a mere servant, he looked upon that officer to be no more a servant than the judge's clerk in the superior Courts.

PETITION.

LORD BROUGHAM presented a petition, to which he begged the attention of their Lordships, praying their Lordships to take up the consideration of the Bills of Exchange Bill in the early part of next Session. It was from the London Committee of the Merchants associated for the Assimilation and Improvement of the Mercantile Law of England, Scotland, and Ireland. It comprised many of the most eminent houses in the City—men of great ability, varied experience, high honour, and—what they themselves would not place in front of their claims to respect, but which, he must add, of ample wealth. They had attended the great Conference held in November, 1852, of delegates from all the trading towns of the three kingdoms. He had the honour of presiding on the first day; his noble Friend (the Earl of Harrowby) took the chair the day after; and a Commission was afterwards issued, at the desire of the Conference, by his noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Aberdeen), his predecessor (the Earl of Derby) having, at the time of the meeting, expressed his approval of that course.

The first object of the great assemblage referred to, had been the assimilation of the bankrupt and insolvent law; but he believed he might state that there was a general opinion in favour of adopting, from the Scotch law and practice, the process of summary diligence on bills of exchange and promissory notes, the measure for which the present petitioners were so anxious. As their organ, he had presented to their Lordships a Bill to give summary execution on protested bills, and their Lordships had received it most favourably. It passed through all its stages, without a dissentient voice, including that of the Select Committee on the Common Law Procedure Bill, to which it was referred. It had the warm support of his noble and learned Friends the law lords; and, having been introduced before Easter, it was finally passed, and sent down to the other House on the 2nd June; it was read a second time on the 9th, but being delayed from time to time until last Friday, it was then most unfortunately withdrawn, in consequence of some opposition which it encountered. The withdrawing it, he regarded as a great mistake; for, from all he had heard on the subject, he felt confident that the opposition to it would have entirely failed, as it had a few days before, when a great majority voted for this important measure.

The ground on which the opposition first rested was this. Their Lordships were told, "You have adopted a rule that no Bill shall be read after July 25; here is a Bill of ours—of the Commons—which we cannot send up before the 4th of August, and which, therefore, falls within the scope of the prohibitory order. Our Bill cannot pass this year; and, therefore, we will not pass your Bill. That is to say, because the Lords will not pass an important Bill sent up on the 4th of August, and which there is no time whatever given for considering, therefore the Commons will not pass a Bill sent down two months ago, and for considering which ample time had been given. He was very sorry the Commons Bill had come up so late, because he believed it contained a very beneficial change in the criminal law. This he said from a regard to its own merits; but he also greatly respected the authority by which it was sanctioned—his learned and much-esteemed Friend Mr. Baron Alderson was understood to have suggested it. Nevertheless, to pass it without any the least consideration was out of the question; and the print had only been delivered that morning, inasmuch that his noble and learned Friend the Chief Justice was not aware, he believed, of its existence till he told him of it half an hour ago, and certainly had not even seen it. To pass suddenly, and without the least deliberation, a Bill creating some half-dozen new misdemeanors—he might say, felonies, for the punishment was imprisonment with hard labour—was manifestly impossible. Yet, because we refused to do this, the Commons, influenced by sticklers for their privileges, refused to pass a Bill which they had been discussing for two months and more.

It was further opposed by another class of persons, who had found champions in that House—persons who, having signed their names as acceptors, or drawers, or indorsers, having thus made themselves debtors under their own hands, and received value in consequence, had rather not pay the debt contracted—preferred escaping from the liability which they had incurred. On behalf of this very honest and respectable class it was said, "How cruel to compel them to pay. When a man has signed a promise to pay in three months, and has received the value of his promise, how hard that he should be obliged to pay at the day. Why should not the poor man be allowed three or four months longer, with all the chances of the law? Why not let him, instead of paying his creditor, defy him in a court of law, and delay payment till the suit is ended?" This is the law which the advocates of these worthy persons conceive to be just. It is neither the law of justice, nor of common honesty; and it is the law of England alone.

In all other trading countries the law of honesty prevails—the law which compels men to pay at the day they have voluntarily, and under their own hands bound themselves to pay, and not at some uncertain time which may suit their own convenience. That law of common honesty has been established in Scotland for one hundred and seventy years, during which period the growth of its commercial towns, of Glasgow especially, has been rapid beyond all example.

The same law of summary execution prevails in France, in the Netherlands, in Holland, where, indeed, it is more stringent still—in all trading countries except those subject to English law—and even in this country it was the law of old. The process, six centuries ago, under statutes merchant and statutes staple, was exactly the summary diligence now desired, by which the debtor's person, land, and goods were answerable, without any action; and this, in all cases of debt acknowledged. Had bills of exchange, therefore, existed in Edward the First's time, to them this summary execution would of course have been applied.

Another class of objectors had also joined these advocates of the dishonest debtors—he meant those worthy but somewhat speculative reasoners who laboured under what might be termed a delusion on the subject of currency. He referred to what was termed the "Birmingham school," whose doctrines were, that what ever tends to restrict the amount of the currency, is an unmixed evil. Those doctors hold that the greater the bulk of the currency, so much the better; and, so the quantity be unrestricted, the quality is not material. Hence, as the summary execution—the making all paper really payable at the day—might lessen the amount in circulation, though it would greatly increase its value—these doctors abhor the proposed assimilation of our mercantile law. "What signifies," say they, "these bills being only made payable by means of an action at law, and being, therefore, of so much the less value? That is nothing; their number—the mass of them—is the great object; and so that this be large, their inferior value signifies little."

These currency men, however, have found out a new and somewhat unexpected objection to the measure. It did not originate, we are told, in any desire to improve our jurisprudence—any wish to assimilate the law of England to that of all other countries. No such thing. It is all a mere job. One of them, a most excellent person, wholly incapable of deceit, but practised upon by some dishonest party quite capable of such things, has not scrupled to denounce the whole as originating in corrupt design—"There can be but one reason for bringing it forward; somebody or other wanted to appoint a registrar. Who wants the Bill? Who asked for it?"

I have shown your Lordships (said Lord Brougham) who it is that asks for the Bill. These petitioners representing the 309 leading firms in the City, of perhaps

1,000 partners, whose petition for the Bill was a few days ago presented to the other House by my noble Friend and kinsman their representative—they ask for the Bill—they anxiously pray that this important measure may be sanctioned by Parliament. But, say the currency doctors, “it is one of the grossest jobs ever attempted to be palmed upon the public.” That is, the Bill was contrived and presented, and carried through this House, with the design and for the purpose not of amending the mercantile law, and giving honest creditors an effectual remedy against dishonest debtors, but merely to create the office of registrar, that some favoured person might be appointed to hold it.

What if all this ingenious notion is a mere fancy? What if it is as unreal as it is far-fetched? What if it has not even the shadow of foundation? What if it be a pure fiction, a mere imagination? What if it is utterly, and from beginning to end, false! What if it be not only untrue, but utterly and absolutely impossible—to have not only no foundation, not the shadow of foundation, but to be perfectly impossible to have any? The Bill was presented without one single word about a registrar in it, from beginning to end, or of any office whatever to be created. The registration of protests was given to the masters of the three Courts—Queen’s Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, to be named by the Judges of these Courts. In this shape it was presented to your Lordships, in this shape it was proposed by me, with a statement that the masters and no other officer were to register the protests. In this shape, you gave it a second reading, and referred it to the Select Committee; and it was only there that the registrar was ever thought of, and was inserted on the suggestion which had been made by mercantile men in the City, and approved by the society of notaries, and accorded with the practice in Scotland—a most fit, and, indeed, absolutely necessary suggestion, because it was found that the masters of the courts never could do the business, a separate office being required which should be open at all hours, from early in the day to late in the evening, and under the direction of some one wholly devoted to the duty. It was, moreover, essential that this office should be in the City; and the experience of Scotland, which was cited to us, amply proved that nothing could be more erroneous than the plan originally adopted of the masters, the only plan that ever had entered into the head of those who framed the Bill. Those considerations were decisive with the Select Committee, which at once struck out the provision giving the registration to the officers of the courts, and substituted the appointment of a registrar.

It has been my fortune at different times to propound various measures for the improvement of our jurisprudence: I grieve to say that I have had to encounter opposition in many powerful quarters—to conflict with adversaries, and sustain attacks of very different kinds, in common with my able and learned colleagues in the labour of law-amendment. Sometimes we have been charged with doing too little, and proceeding too slowly—sometimes with moving too rapidly, and attempting too much. Now we are complained of, as wanting in zeal, or in firmness, or in boldness—we are termed moderate, and temporising, and even mock reformers. Now we are held up as objects rather of alarm than of contempt—as rash innovators—as holding no existing institution sacred—as carrying devastation over the established law, like some eruption sweeping and laying waste its whole domain—or the volcano may at times be imagined to slumber, and only give out noise and smoke. To all such obloquy we have long been accustomed and inured; and we can only meet it by gratefully avowing that having, through the Divine blessing, been permitted to render such service as we could—given such furtherance as we might to the great cause of improvement—we shall persevere in the same course while the same Providence shall allow us, steadily refusing either to slacken or to quicken our pace, and firmly resolved neither to leave untried what is safe and right, nor to attempt what is in doubt and exposed to hazard.

But among all the charges we have had to meet, among all the imputations that have been launched against us, till now we never had conceived that any adversaries could be so misguided as to question the purity of our motives—so wild as to suspect the great mercantile community of London, as well as the lawyers their coadjutors, of being engaged in a conspiracy to perpetrate a disgraceful job. It seems hardly possible to believe that such a foul calumny could be uttered in a place where, less than a week before, the prayer had been preferred by all the first merchants and bankers of the country in behalf of this great measure, this true amendment of the law, grounded on the most approved principles, and recommended by the universal experience of the commercial world. For such base imputations we cannot possibly feel anything but the most sovereign contempt. Nor will they either cause us to abate our speed or to quicken it, or make us deviate by a hair's breadth from our course—our course appointed and selected—selected under Providence for our labours. Why should we be for an instant affected by such charges? Why, above all, should those whom on this occasion I represent, care for the calumnies vented against them? Falsus honor juvat—I crave pardon for addressing its authors in unknown tongues; let them hear it in literal though less poetical words—

False honour charms, and lying slander scares
Whom but the false and faulty?

These petitioners belong to neither class, and may well afford to disregard it.

LORD CAMPBELL said, he should content himself with deploring the fate of the measure in question, and considered it hardly necessary for the noble and learned Lord to have referred to the charges he had mentioned, wherever they were made, for, in his opinion, they might have been treated very safely with silent contempt. The fate of this Bill, however, was very disheartening to Members of their Lordships' House, who were continually striving to improve the law in a rational manner. He would not allude to the class which had been termed "currency doctors," or to any other class of the community who stood in the way of improvement; but experience had taught them that the obstacles thrown in the way were really appalling. There could be no doubt that it was of immense importance that the commercial law of the three portions of the United Kingdom should be assimilated, and such an assimilation would introduce reforms which might lead to the most important commercial advantages. He was, perhaps, as competent to speak on this point as any of their Lordships, as he had the honour of presiding in Her Majesty's Court of Queen's Bench, where a great many causes were tried, and he assured the House that in very many the money of the creditor was wasted by the fraudulent debtor in litigation. Frequently the acceptor of a bill of exchange, who, having had value received, and having failed to pay at the end of the period, had an action brought against him, set up a number of fraudulent and unfounded defences, and when the day of trial came no real justification was attempted. At one single sitting of his court, at Guildhall, within the last four weeks, there were no less than sixteen actions on bills of exchange, in which the defendants did not attempt to set up the shadow of a shade of defence. He saw no reason, therefore, why they should not do as they did in Scotland, and in every other commercial country, and, indeed, in the time of Edward I. in this country, and give a power of execution on every overdue Bill. He trusted that another Session of Parliament would be more auspicious than the present, which, however, he trusted would witness the passing of that very important measure of legal reform—the Common Law Procedure Bill, although he could not think it safe until he saw it back again in their Lordships' House.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR entirely concurred with his noble and learned Friend in deploring the fate of this Bill. He could assure the noble and learned Lord who introduced it that Her Majesty's Government had given it all the support in their power, and he hoped it would be reintroduced and become law in the early part of next Session. With respect to the Common Law Procedure Bill, he trusted it would come up from the other House tomorrow, after the third reading, so that it might become law this present year.

LORD BROUGHAM said, that nothing could give greater comfort, both to himself and the petitioners whom he represented, than what had fallen from both his noble and learned Friends. He should now present the Bill with such amendments as had been suggested and approved by the authors of it since it left their Lordships' House, that it might be circulated during the recess. It had been said elsewhere that the measure was not sufficiently known in the country. This assertion was extremely incorrect. It had been the subject of great discussion in all the trading towns, in several of which meetings had been held and resolutions adopted in its favour. But it would be advisable to have it circulated again with the changes which had been introduced both in this House and since it went to the Commons. And he moved to have it read a first time.

LORD BROUGHAM then presented a Bill to permit the Registration of dishonoured Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes in England, and to allow Execution thereon.

Bill read 1^a.

THE COMMON LAW PROCEDURE BILL— QUESTION.

LORD CAMPBELL inquired what course it was intended to take in reference to the Common Law Procedure Bill?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the Common Law Procedure Bill, which was now before the House of Commons, contained clauses which gave to the courts of common law the power to deal with and decide the whole dispute between parties, so that it might not, as was the case at present, be requisite to apply to Courts of Equity with respect to some parts which might not come under the jurisdiction of the courts of law. After that Bill had passed the House of Lords, the Commission now occupied with the reform of Chancery Procedure suggested that there ought to be a converse measure, and that clauses should be introduced into it for the purpose of giving the Courts of Chancery also the power of deciding on the whole of every question brought before them. It was thought desirable that they should have the power to summon juries to decide questions of fact and to assess damages without calling in the assistance of a court of law. He (the Lord Chancellor), however, thought that it would not be germane to the subject-matter of the Common Law Procedure Bill to introduce such clauses as these into it; and, accordingly, the Solicitor General introduced the Chancery Amendment Bill to carry out this object, which, however, must contain many more provisions to enable it to work. Without professing to be too much enamoured of the system of juries, yet when there was an issue which required damages to be assessed, he did not feel persuaded that a Judge of a court of equity was the most competent person to assess the damages. To manage this matter well it seemed that they must leave the trial by jury where it now was, and let issues be directed, or they must provide means to enable the Court of Equity to summon juries, and try issues there. As, however, the matter could not be proceeded with this Session, he wished not to commit himself by saying whether it was the fittest that the Court of Chancery should have the power to summon juries, or that matters should be left to be decided, as at present, by issues directed to the Common Law Courts. He did not say that he might not come to be of opinion that it was right to give power to the Court of Chancery to summon juries, but he wished at present to leave the matter open. In answer to the question of his noble and learned Friend, he must say that he had no power to bring forward the Bill unless their Lordships suspended their Resolution upon the ground that the matter of this Bill was of recent occurrence and urgency, within the exception of the Resolution. But to propose this would not be acting in fairness to the Resolution which their Lordships had come to in the month of May last. He trusted, however, that in a new Session of Parliament some measure would be introduced, either the same Bill as had been already introduced, or some more general measure, as to inquiring into matters of fact in the Court of Chancery.

BRIBERY, &c., BILL.

Bill Read 3^a (according to Order), with the Amendments.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, he wished to propose an Amendment, the effect of which was to disallow the payment of travelling expenses to voters. He felt that it was desirable to make this Bill as perfect as possible, for if the measures which it contemplated failed, we should have to come to the ballot, since, to whatever objections that method of voting might be liable, there was reason to believe that it would be in some degree effectual in putting down undue influence, if not bribery. He objected to this clause, because it was evident that so long as any payments were allowed to be made to voters, a door was left open to corrupt practices; nor was there any way in which such an opening could be more effectually left than by permitting the payment of travelling expenses, which frequently amounted to an enormous sum at contested elections, and usually figured as the greatest part of the expenses of a contested election. It was a kind of expenditure over which no check could be exercised, because there was obviously nothing to prevent a voter's representing himself to have come from a much greater distance than he actually did, or representing himself to have adopted a much more expensive mode of travelling than was in fact the case, and thus obtaining an additional sum beyond his actual expenditure, which

w s, in fact, a bribe. Since he had give notice of his Amendment, he had indeed been told that it had been considered by the House of Commons, and rejected by majority of two to one. He thought, however, that they had already shown sufficient deference to the other House by entertaining this Bill, notwithstanding their Resolution of the 2nd of May, and that they need not, therefore, feel any delicacy in adopting this Amendment. Then it was said that they must either open a door to corruption by adopting this Amendment, or disfranchise voters by rejecting it. Well, if that was so, he did not hesitate to say that he thought the latter the preferable alternative. The argument against the disallowance of travelling expenses, founded upon its anticipated effect of disfranchising voters, could indeed have no force except against the supporters of universal suffrage. For it was once said that a man must have a certain property qualification in order to have a vote; he did not see how any difficulty could be felt in saying that he must also have sufficient property to come to the poll. He meant, of course, from a reasonable distance; because if there were not sufficient polling places in the county, so that every voter might be within a moderate distance of some one of them, more must be provided; and, in fact, there could be no doubt if this Amendment were agreed to, it would be necessary to do this in many counties in Ireland. The Legislature could never put down bribery so long as the payment of the travelling expenses of voters was allowed. They had been told the other evening by a noble and learned Lord that the law was decidedly against the payment of any such expenses, and he had no doubt whatever that that was the law. The House of Commons, however, who were bound to administer the law, did not in practice interpret it in that light; and as Parliament seemed to be sincerely desirous of putting down bribery, it was only fitting that what constituted bribery should be placed beyond doubt. He begged to move an Amendment on the 23rd clause, which would make the clause run as follows—

"That after the passing of this Act it shall not be lawful for any candidate or other person to pay, or cause to be paid, the expenses of bringing any voter to the poll."

LORD REDESDALE objected upon several grounds to the Amendment proposed by the noble Marquess. He thought their Lordships ought to object as strongly to the introduction of important Amendments into questions deliberately decided by the House of Commons as they ought to undertaking the consideration of such important Amendments at that period of the Session. In fairness and justice to the other House, it was impossible not to refer to the fact, that in Committee, upon the report, and upon the third reading of the Bill, this clause had been affirmed by majorities exceeding two to one, and upon each occasion it had been supported by the Government. Even a proposition to allow travelling expenses only to such voters as came from a greater distance than a mile and a half from the poll was rejected without a division. With regard to the payment of travelling expenses itself, he was of opinion that if no more than the travelling expenses were paid, then it was not bribery, inasmuch as the voter gained nothing by having his travelling expenses paid. The objection which had been urged by the noble Marquess, that more than the expenses of travelling would be paid, would be removed by the provision made in the Bill for the appointment of an election auditor, through whose hands the expenses would be paid. If it had been asserted that a proposal was to be made to set aside a decision of the House of Commons, several times affirmed by large majorities, and to send down the Bill, as amended, to be considered in the other House in the last days of the Session, he did not believe that their Lordships would have thought it reasonable or courteous to the House of Commons to have suspended the Standing Orders in order to enable them to take the Bill into consideration. He was certainly of opinion that, if this clause were omitted, an undue advantage would be given to voters in towns over those residing some distance from the place of polling, and, under the circumstances, he thought it expedient to adhere to the decision come to by the House of Commons.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, that he was glad his noble Friend had become a convert to the opinions which he (the Duke of Newcastle) had expressed the other night. As to the Amendment of the noble Marquess, he entirely concurred in the opinion that when they were dealing with bribery and every other kind of illegitimate expense, it was most desirable that they should put an end to that very heavy item in election expenses which had hitherto gone under the name of "travelling ling expenses;" and if he were obliged to give a vote, "aye" or "no," on the question that had been raised by the noble Marquess, he would unquestionably vote with him that travelling expenses should be made, like the expenses for refreshments, illegal for the future. At the same time he readily admitted that there was a good deal to be said in regard to the particular moment at which they were debating this question as affecting the decisions of the House of Commons; and consistently with the views which he had advocated on Monday last, although individually he approved of the Amendment of the noble Marquess, he did not think it would be expedient to adopt it on the present occasion. He came to that conclusion—he would not say the more readily—but with the less reluctance—on account of the temporary nature of the Act as it now stood. He had already said he approved of the spirit of the Amendment, but he could not approve undoubtedly of the exact form of the Amendment of his noble Friend, even if he felt at liberty to vote with him; for this reason, he did not think his noble Friend had proceeded in the best way to accomplish his own object. He doubted if the adoption of the Amendment, as it was now worded, would not create greater difficulties than exist at the present moment, and render it exceedingly uncertain what they meant; for instance, he thought the insertion of the word "not" would render it uncertain, whether if a man residing in a village, and being obliged to hire a fly to go to the poll, should ask a neighbour to take a seat in the fly with him, he would not come under the terms of the Act, and be indictable for a breach of the law for taking his neighbour in the fly he had hired, though he would be at liberty to take him in his own gig if he had one. The noble Marquess seemed hardly to have looked at his Amendment in this point of view, and the difficulty which suggested itself showed that the question was one which required more consideration than had been given to it. Undoubtedly, as his noble Friend opposite had stated, the clause had been affirmed on two or three occasions in the other House by large majorities; and looking to the advanced period of the Session, and to the certainty that when the Bill should be sent back to the other House there would be only a portion of those Members present who had voted "aye" or "no" on the question, it was undesirable, within a few days of the close of the Session, to add any new provision, or to alter any provision of the House of Commons, and completely, as was proposed, to reverse the decision deliberately adopted by the other House. He should, he repeated, adopt the course he thought it necessary to take with greater reluctance, were it not that the temporary nature of the Bill ensured its revision at an early day, when he hoped a clause would be introduced in future specifically making travelling expenses illegal. Nevertheless, he was not prepared to show unlimited deference to the House of Commons, by accepting the clause in its present shape, because he considered there was a wide difference between reversing a decision of the House of Commons, and leaving the law as it was at present. One of the good features of the Bill was, that it defined what hitherto had been left undefined in many respects, and had settled by an Act of the Legislature those questions which had been so much disputed before Committees of the House of Commons, and had led to such expensive and unnecessary litigation. As the least evil of three courses, the course he was about to propose he thought ought to be acceptable to their Lordships, and ought not to be objected to by the House of Commons. If his noble Friend's Amendment should be negatived or withdrawn, he (the Duke of Newcastle) would propose that this clause should be omitted, that they should leave the law as it at present stands, and leave this question to be decided, when the subject, in the course of two years, should be brought forward for the reinvestigation of the Legislature. He should like to have met the Amendment of his noble Friend with another form of words, but looking to the circumstances under which the measure came from the other House, and the way in which the clause had been introduced after three divisions in the House of Commons, he hoped their Lordships would agree with him that the course he proposed was the preferable course, and that the clause should be omitted altogether.

LORD CAMPBELL said, he should not have agreed to the suspension of the Standing Orders if he had thought that they were not to be at liberty to examine and consider the different clauses of the Bill. It would be most injurious to pass this clause in its present condition, and, though he would not give any opinion himself as to whether the payment of travel-was, in fact, a bribe. Since he had given notice of his Amendment, he had indeed been told that it had been considered by the House of Commons, and rejected by majority of two to one. LORD CAMPBELL said, he should not have agreed to the suspension of the Standing Orders if he had thought that they were not to be at liberty to examine and consider the different clauses of the Bill. It would be most injurious to pass this clause in its present condition, and, though he would not give any opinion himself as to whether the payment of travelling expenses was bribery or not, he might observe that it had been decided to be bribery by no less an authority than Lord Mansfield, and that that decision had never been reversed by any court of law. If the clause were agreed to, it might admit of universal bribery, and those enormous evils would be called into existence which were experienced before the passing of the Reform Bill—namely, of bringing up to the poll non-resident voters from distant parts of the kingdom, and even from distant parts of Europe. For his own part, he doubted whether, under the construction of this Bill, travelling expenses would come at all under the cognisance of the election officer, and he was quite at a loss to imagine how, if their Lordships agreed to this clause, they could separate from the travelling expenses the refreshments provided upon the journey. He would, however, suggest to the noble Marquess the propriety of withdrawing his Amendment, and agreeing to that of the noble Duke.

THE EARL OF STRADBROKE observed that, though he would not interpose to prevent the passing of a measure which had been maturely considered by the House of Commons, he certainly thought there were some parts of it which required amendment.

LORD REDESDALE begged again to call attention to the fact that this clause had been supported by the Cabinet Ministers in the House of Commons, though it was now proposed by another Cabinet Minister that it should be omitted. He desired to know whether he would receive on a division the support of the other Cabinet Ministers in their Lordships' House, and whether it was their intention to support the decision of their colleagues in the House of Commons.

LORD BROUGHAM expressed his concurrence in the observations of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Campbell), and for the reasons stated by him. He wished the Bill to pass, but he should be alarmed at sending it down with any considerable alterations to another place, where, it should be recollected, it had been carried by a narrow majority on the third reading.

INCUMBERED ESTATES (WEST INDIES) BILL.

Order for Committee read.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he would take that occasion to call the attention of the House to that portion of the West Indian incumbrances which had arisen from the loan which had been granted in the year 1832, in consequence of the destruction of property in those islands, which had been caused by the hurricanes which had prevailed there in 1831. Previous to the Act authorising the hurricane loan, a loan had been also granted to some of the proprietors in Jamaica in consequence of the injury they sustained from the violence which took place during the rebellion. The loan, which was extended to the West Indies in consequence of the hurricane, had been standing from that time to this; and lately the Government had been pressing for the repayment of the whole. In a return moved for by the right hon. Member for Coventry (Mr. Ellice) in respect of that loan, he had to complain that a sum of between 200,000*l.* and 300,000*l.* had been included which was not lent to the proprietors or any other persons, but in the shape of public loans to the islands. From that return, however, it would appear that the aggregate sum originally lent to individuals in the islands was 713,000*l.*, and that 465,000*l.* now remained outstanding, the Government having received up to this time as interest very nearly 300,000*l.*, exclusive of interest on loans to the islands. Now, in a letter which had been written last February by the Secretary of the Treasury a refusal was given to enter into a compromise, which the inhabitants of the West Indies had requested, and the hon. Gentleman had then proceeded to state that the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury were prepared to proceed, in virtue of the Act 8 & 9 Vict. c. 50, to accept a composition in lieu of the loan equivalent to the present value of the property in St. Vincent, in all those cases in which it could be satisfactorily proved to the Loan Commissioners that the value of each estate, if offered for sale, should seem to be less than the amount now due for principal and interest upon the loan. [Mr. WILSON: Hear, hear.] The hon. Gentleman cheered that statement, but he (Sir John Pakington) should like to ask whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer, acting upon principles of common charity, was prepared to be guided by the passage which he had just quoted to the House—a passage which, in fact, amounted to a declaration, that in all those cases in which the value of an estate had sunk below the amount which had been lent, the Government, by way of doing a favour to the West Indians, were prepared to accept a sum of money equivalent to the present value of the estate? Why, that was in effect to say that they were resolved to confiscate the remaining property of those West Indian proprietors. Indeed, with the exception of the case of Shylock and the pound of flesh, he could remember nothing so cruel as that climax to our legislation, in reference to our West Indian Colonies, which the passage of the letter of the Secretary to the Treasury which he had alluded to announced it to be the intention of the Government to carry into execution. In the island of St. Vincent there were twenty-three estates which were really worth a sum of 36,000*l.* less than the sum in which they were indebted, in consequence of the loan. Now, if the Government were determined to confiscate those estates, the result would be that out of those twenty-three estates no less than eighteen would be altogether confiscated. He believed matters would be in quite as unfavourable a position in the island of St. Lucia. With respect to seven estates which had been sold in the island of St. Vincent, he should state that the actual selling price of the estates was 90 per cent less than it was at the period at which the Hurricane Loan was first made. And while such as he had been describing was the state of things in the West Indies, the whole course of the legislation of this country in respect to those Colonies had, instead of tending to promote their prosperity, tended directly to reduce them to a state, he might almost say, of absolute ruin. Upon the other hand, the paltry amount of the loan which remained uncanceled was more than compensated for by the advantages which had resulted from the reduction of the price of sugar—a reduction which had been effected by doing considerable injury to the West Indian proprietors. Upwards of 300,000*l.* had been gained by this country by the reduction to which he referred, and the proprietors of the estates in question had suggested to the Government that the debt should be lowered in the same ratio as their estates had, in consequence of recent legislation, been diminished in value. Now, he thought that a fair proposition, though he would admit that there might be some difficulty in the way of carrying that suggestion into effect in some of the islands; but still it seemed to him to be one which was perfectly equitable. A remission of 1,000,000*l.* had been made last year in the case of Ireland, and in his opinion the claims of Ireland to be the object of that act of generosity upon the part of the Government were scarcely so strong as that which the West Indian proprietors could urge. He trusted, therefore, that the Government would meet the question in a fair and generous spirit, and that they would not act upon the letter of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Treasury, which advocated the resort to measures which would be found to amount to an actual confiscation of property in the West Indies.

MR. J. WILSON said, he could not say he thought the right hon. Gentleman had taken a wise or a prudent course in bringing this matter before the House at the present time, for all the effect it could have would be to create hopes which must necessarily be disappointed among the parties who had obtained these loans. Already the uncertainty in which the West India proprietors had been kept as to the intentions of the Government had been very prejudicial to the improvement of their estates. These loans had been borrowed under the Act of the 2 & 3 Will. IV., in the year 1832 or 1833. By the terms of that Act these loans were to be repaid in ten years, but before that period expired Parliament extended the term for ten years further. Not satisfied with that lenient treatment, in 1848 that House passed an Act whereby the annual payments during these last ten years were extended for a further period of five years. This term expired in August last. It then became the imperative duty of the Government to determine in one way or another what should be done with regard to these loans. It was quite obvious that, if the question had been still left open, not only would the existing proprietors have been unable to obtain any credit upon their estates, but that the interest of individuals would be rather to allow these estates to deteriorate than to be improved. The Government, indeed, had been distinctly informed that this was the direct result which ensued from the want of a settlement in this matter. The duty of the Government, then, in order that these islands might be restored to some measure of prosperity, was by some means or other to bring all these claims to as early a conclusion as possible. They had found that it was impossible to apply a common rule to all cases. The principle adopted by the Government had, however, been this—that if a person could show that he was prepared to pay as much as the Government would be able, through an expensive and what might be called a harsh mode of treatment, ultimately to obtain, then they would feel justified in accepting this sum of money, considerably less than the actual value of the estate, but not smaller than the amount which the estate would bring to the Government if they foreclosed their mortgage. He thought this was a very just and fair principle to act upon, and one which would be thought satisfactory by the public. The general principle they had laid down, and which the Exchequer Loan Commissioners had communicated to the parties, was, that they were empowered to extend to 1859, and no longer, the payment of these loans, and meanwhile they were prepared to receive applications for compounding and settling them in any way most convenient to the proprietors. The fair and liberal spirit in which any such propositions would be received might be judged of from the fact that, since last year, in Jamaica, out of fifty-six estates the Exchequer Loan Commissioners had succeeded in bringing into a fair way of settlement, by sale or by payment, no less than forty-one. One fact which ought to be known by the House was, that persons had been speculating upon the ruin of others in the West Indies, in order to get the Government to give up their claims. Would the Government be justified in throwing away the public money in any such way? All he could say was, that where an original bond fide debtor and owner of the estate made a proposition to the Exchequer Loan Commissioners, such a proposition would be received with every desire to settle the claim in the most liberal spirit. He hoped, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman would be satisfied to leave the matter in the hands of the Government, with an assurance that, while they would endeavour to do their duty to the public, yet that where there was a bond fide disposition to settle the matter on the part of the proprietors, and no disposition to speculate, the Exchequer Loan Commissioners would receive any such applications with every possible desire to meet them fairly and liberally.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, the hon. Gentleman had alluded to a case in which the sale of an estate had been made matter of speculation with reference to the claims of the Government. The statement of the hon. Member referred, he supposed, to the sale of an estate in the island of St. Lucia. If so, he (Sir J. Pakington) could give a satisfactory explanation of the matter.

MR. ELLICE said, that after the statement of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, he must say that the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir J. Pakington) had characterised the whole of the proceedings on the part of the Government appeared to him exceedingly just. The hon. Member (Mr. Wilson) said that, if the West India proprietors would pay as much of their debts as the Treasury could by any process exact from these estates, Government would listen to any applications which might be made to them. Now, he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Pakington), that this was a petty, oppressive, and vexatious proceeding. He concurred with the hon. Gentleman in thinking that it was worse than useless to have the sword suspended any longer over the heads of these unfortunate debtors, and that the matter should be settled now, once and for all; but the case of these poor West India proprietors was a very hard one, and had met with very little sympathy either from that House, from the Government, or, he feared, from the public at large. A highly vicious system of artificial prosperity had been founded in the West Indies, and founded upon the worst principles—slavery and protection. We had taken suddenly away the basis upon which the whole fabric rested; the fabric had fallen, and irretrievably fallen; and while this was going on, instead of taking to ourselves the blame of the system from which all these miserable consequences had issued, we scolded the victims, treating them in the manner now proposed by the hon. Secretary to the Treasury; and their case altogether had met with about as little consideration as it was possible to conceive. When free-trade principles were for the first time brought into practice, losses were sustained by particular interests, but they had by the present time been, he believed, almost forgotten; but, in the West India Islands, when it was determined to introduce better principles of law, the complication and difficulties which existed under the old system not only continued, but appeared likely to become perpetual. The Bill now before the House appeared to him to be likely to put an end to one difficulty. The House would consider that West India property had been hampered by all the restrictions by which landed property in this country had been hampered. There existed the heir at law, the creation of trusts, and, in fact, every complication which had existed with regard to landed property in this country; and now, at last, a Bill was introduced into Parliament to enable various parties to obtain new titles to their estates, and so, he hoped, to come to some settlement of the difficulties which existed in those islands. With regard to the money which had been lent to proprietors of estates in those islands, it had been lent at a time when there was a prospect of it being repaid by the estates, but now it was not at all probable that any great portion of the money which was due to the public would ever be received from them. The whole subject was one which, in his opinion, it would have been desirable to refer to a Committee of that House, in order that it might meet with the fullest inquiry as to the circumstances under which these loans were advanced, the circumstances which have affected West India property, and the prospect there was of those loans being eventually repaid. The Report of such a Committee should not be confined to any particular cases, but generally as to the most fitting method of dealing in a fair and liberal manner with the whole subject. By the course which had been pursued, it appeared to him that the Loan Commissioners might think fit to draw a distinction between different districts, and he could conceive nothing more likely to lead to dissatisfaction, and nothing less likely to secure the object which the hon. Gentleman had in view—of obtaining as much as could be obtained fairly for the public. The subject was not one which, in his opinion, ought to be dealt with by the Treasury, as it came within the legitimate functions of the Secretary of State for the Colonies; and he appealed to his right hon. Friend (Sir G. Grey) to consider the subject, and to see if some general measure could not be applied to remedy the difficulties which existed.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he did not wish to shrink from any responsibility that fairly attached to the office which he had the honour to hold. But his right hon. Friend (Mr. Ellice) must be aware that the duty of collecting the debts in that case had already been imposed by law on the Exchequer Loan Commissioners, subject to the general control and superintendence of the Treasury. Under the present law, all that he could do was that which had actually been done by himself and his predecessors in office—namely, to collect from the West Indies, through the medium of Government influence, all the information with respect to the financial and social condition of those colonies which might be necessary for the guidance of the Exchequer Loan Commissioners and of the Treasury, in the course of their labours. In common with his right hon. Friend he felt deep sympathy for the proprietors of West India estates. But his right hon. Friend should remember that the distress of which those proprietors complained had not been created of late years, and was not to be attributed to recent legislation, but that it dated back to a period preceding the Emancipation Act, and that in many instances it had had its origin at an epoch anterior to the lifetime of many of those whom he had the honour of then addressing. His right hon. Friend seemed to think that some general rule ought to be adopted applicable to the whole of those cases. But it appeared to him (Sir G. Grey) that it would be extremely undesirable to attempt to apply any general rule to cases which differed so much in their particular features. The rule which, as he understood, had been adopted by the Treasury, and which he considered was a just and reasonable one, was, that each individual case should be considered on its own merits; and that when a proprietor made a fair proposal for the settlement of his debt, the Treasury should have power to accept that proposal, and to leave such a proprietor the means of continuing to cultivate his estate. At the same time, however, the interest of the taxpayers in this country should not be overlooked, and the Treasury would have no right to throw away the public money in cases in which it could be recovered without any undue severity to individuals. It should also be borne in mind that that was a debt to which the nominal proprietors of the estates were not the parties who were in reality liable; and that if the Government were to forego the whole of those claims, they would be conferring a favour, not on the West India proprietors, but on mortgagees and consignees in this country. He thought that what the Government ought to do was, not to insist on its strict rights in that case, but to exercise a sound discretion in endeavouring to obtain the repayment of as large a portion of that money as could be obtained without unduly pressing on individuals or on the Colonies generally. He believed that the Bill now under consideration would do more than any other which had ever been submitted to Parliament to raise the value of that property, and to facilitate its sale at a higher price than it could otherwise command; and, on the whole, he felt that the measure was one most conducive to the real interests of the owners of West India property. He regretted that Parliament had not then before them all the papers, which would enable them to arrive at a full and decided conclusion upon the merits of that question and upon the course which had been pursued by the Government; but he trusted that they would be put in possession of those papers at an early period of the next Session. In conclusion, he should enter his protest against the supposition that the conduct of the Exchequer Loan Commissioners had been characterised by any persecution of individuals. He had reason to believe, on the contrary, that that conduct had been marked by forbearance and moderation.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, that representing, to a certain extent, the West India interest in that House, he felt that they were much indebted to the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir J. Pakington) for having directed their attention to that important subject, because, if for no other reason, the right hon. Gentleman had elicited from the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for the Colonies a statement of a character much more encouraging to the West India proprietors than the language which had previously emanated from the hon. Secretary to the Treasury. Those proprietors had certainly been given to understand by the Treasury, that the claims were to be pressed with far greater severity than appeared to be contemplated by the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for the Colonies. He believed that the pressing of the sale of West India estates at the present moment would be equivalent to their complete confiscation. The value of the property of the West India proprietors had of late years been almost annihilated; but some of those proprietors were still resolutely struggling against their difficulties, and it would surely not be desirable that the Government should at present adopt measures of severity which would complete the ruin of those men. In his opinion, Her Majesty's Ministers ought not to enforce the public claim in that instance more rigorously than a similar claim had been enforced in Ireland.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, it now appeared that these beautiful islands had been ruined by the policy of that House, first in encouraging slavery, and afterwards in abolishing it, and at the same time refusing to the proprietors all protection. He did not believe the fabric of the West Indies was irretrievably fallen, and he wished to see an inquiry which would tend to its recovery. The Governors of the island could, no doubt, afford most useful information both as to the present position of the West Indies and the best means of placing them in a better position. He entirely approved of the passing of a measure to enable the proprietors of incumbered estates to sell their land and transfer it to persons who would have a better chance of cultivating it at a profit. Such a measure might, however, be presented in a better form. Had proper care been exercised in a similar case which concerned Ireland, the result would have been much less ruinous to the proprietors; and what he desired in this case was, that this Bill should be so framed that the proprietors would obtain the full value of their land. He agreed with the hon. Secretary to the Treasury that the debts to this country ought to be repaid, as far as possible, in full. He knew of no instance in which a debt in Ireland had been remitted; and there was no substantial distinction between the two cases. He would suggest what he considered one great improvement in the Bill, namely, that power should be given to leave a portion of the purchase-money, or debt, in negotiable securities, or what were termed land debentures. His object in making this suggestion was simply to prevent a speculator from purchasing for 5,000*l.* what he might afterwards resell for 20,000*l.* A similar Amendment was proposed at the time when the Irish Incumbered Estates Bill was brought before the Legislature, and it met with almost unanimous approval among the proprietors in Ireland. Its rejection was attended with the most serious consequences. The adoption of this suggestion, and of other improvements with regard to the West Indies, would, he felt assured, be the commencement of an era of prosperity. He hoped the right hon. Baronet (Sir G. Grey) would give him some assurance on the subject.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the present measure was of a temporary nature, and that the subject would necessarily come again under the consideration of Parliament.

House in Committee.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that there was a manifest difference upon the subject between the letter of the Secretary to the Treasury, issued in February last, and the speech delivered that day by the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for the Colonies. According to the letter of the Secretary to the Treasury, the Government would insist on the whole of their claim, and would force the sales of the estates. But the right hon. Baronet had told them, as he (Sir J. Pakington) understood him, that no forced sales were to take place before the next Session of Parliament.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he had merely stated that he thought they would be better enabled to consider that subject in the next Session of Parliament, as they would then be in possession of information which was not at present before them. But he did not mean to imply that there would, in the meantime, be any suspension of proceedings.

The Bill, with some verbal amendments, passed through Committee.

CUSTOMS TARIFF ACTS CONSOLIDATION BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. HUME said, that he quite approved of this Bill as a whole, but he could not let this opportunity pass without expressing his regret that upon 431 articles a duty was still levied, from one-half of which, he firmly believed, the taxation might be removed without the loss of one shilling to the Treasury. At the same time, it was but fair to say that there had been a great improvement within the last fourteen years. In 1840, the number of articles paying duty was as follows:—Raw for manufactures, 262; partially manufactured, 101;

imported ditto, 214; imported for food, 110; prohibited articles, 19; and miscellaneous, 156; making a total of 862 articles. Notwithstanding, however, so many articles were taxed, 94½ per cent of the total sum received arose out of the duty upon seventeen of those articles only. He also regretted to find that in Clause 14 of this Bill goods were to be destroyed in certain cases where the duty was not paid. He hoped that the Bill would be altered in this respect.

MR. J. WILSON said, that this was merely a consolidation Bill, its only purpose being to bring the different Acts which had been passed during the Session into one measure. Hence this was not a proper occasion upon which to make any alteration in the law like that suggested by the hon. Member.

RUSSIAN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES BILL.

Order for Third Reading read.

Bill read 3°.

On the Question that the Bill do pass,

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he would be as brief as possible at that late period of the Session with the observations he felt it his duty to make. He wished, however, to state his reasons for dissenting from the present measure, as regarded one of the propositions it embodied, although he entirely approved of the object the House had in view. The Bill appeared to have three objects:—First, to prevent British subjects from subscribing to any Russian loan, and thereby enabling the Russian Government the more easily to wage war against this country; secondly, to prevent them from becoming the purchasers of any newly-created Russian stock; and thirdly, to prevent them from acquiring, with some few specific exceptions, any such stock under any circumstances whatever. He entirely approved of the first and second objects, and the only objection he had to the Bill so far was, that it appeared to be altogether unnecessary and superfluous. Every one would admit the policy of preventing any persons in this country from becoming subscribers to any Russian loan that might be proposed, as it would be both improper and disloyal to aid with the money of this country a nation with which they were at war. That being the great and important object to be attained by the Bill, it was very remarkable that the Bill had been so framed—although it had undergone the revision of his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General—that it was entirely without the language necessary to give effect to that intention. There were no words in the Bill which would prevent any one subscribing for any new loan proposed by the Russian Government. The holding of stock and the participation or non-participation in it were interdicted, but the prohibition of subscription to a loan was not provided for at all. The Bill said that no British subject should acquire or become interested in or possessed of any stock or stocks. He was surprised that it did not suggest itself to his hon. and learned Friend that a person might subscribe to the amount of millions and then part with his interest in the scrip before anything was introduced in the money market in the shape of stock. He had prepared a clause to meet this defect in the Bill, which provided that “any person who should wilfully or knowingly subscribe to or purchase or take in exchange any loan, stock, fund, scrip, &c., should be guilty of a misdemeanor,” and this, he thought, would meet the views of the House better than the clause at present in the Bill. Undoubtedly to prevent any parties in this country subscribing to a loan was a very important consideration, because suppose the Emperor of Russia was about to raise a loan, say of 5,000,000*l.* sterling, he would have to pay, probably 10 or 12 per cent more for it than he would do if the market of Great Britain were open to him, and he could find subscribers among the people of this country. Indeed, he doubted very much whether the Emperor would be able to raise a loan at all except under very disadvantageous circumstances. He had no wish to divide the House upon this stage of the Bill, because he approved generally of the object of the measure; but he did hope that the Amendment he had suggested would be introduced into the Bill. With regard to the second part of the measure, he quite agreed that it was desirable to prevent any of the subjects of Great Britain, or any one over whom the Legislature had control, from becoming purchasers of newly-created Russian stock; but for reasons which he should state hereafter he thought that the Bill ought not to proceed further than that. It seemed to him that the committee of the Stock Exchange had already done all that they could do by the resolutions they had issued regarding Russian stock. They prevented the Russian stock or funds quoted in their list, and all the

Sir F. Kelly

House of Commons could do by their legislation would do no more. Although a loan might be raised, and although the stock might be purchased, if by an express stipulation they prohibited its purchase or sale in the British market, it would be less valuable than stock of a like nature by reason of the purchase and sale being prohibited. The amount of the depreciation might easily be estimated—there were the three per cents of Spain, and another Spanish stock, which were not permitted to be quoted on the Stock Exchange. The three per cents of Spain were now at 38, and the three per cent Imperial Debt, which was prohibited in this country, and was not quoted on the Stock Exchange, was 34. For these reasons, he objected to any further provision in the Bill, and he proposed to introduce a proviso to the effect that this Act should not extend to any subscription or purchase made in any foreign country by any commercial house or firm trading and having a place of business in any foreign country, and wherein one or more British subjects and one or more aliens were partners or jointly interested. He would take the case of a house in Frankfort, having one or more partners in London. He thought they might trust to the patriotism and honourable and just feeling of the partners in this country that they would not do so; but in the case he had suggested, great injustice would be done to the partners in a foreign house who might think fit to purchase against the will of the British partner. He had prepared an Amendment, therefore, to meet such a case as that. But now with regard to the next question, of acquiring an interest in the stock by other means. He hoped the House, by agreeing to the Amendment he now proposed to introduce in the clause would render his proviso unnecessary. Suppose a mercantile house in this country to be the creditors of some foreign firm to the amount of 20,000*l.*, and the foreign firm were under the necessity of lodging security in the hands of the British house, and had no other security to lodge of a substantial nature but newly-created Russian stock. As the Bill now stood, they would make it a criminal offence for the British house to receive that stock as security for a bond fide debt; while they would do no harm whatever to the Emperor of Russia. Prevent him, if they could, from obtaining a loan; keep the price down, if they could, by preventing the purchase of stock in the English market; but if he had once succeeded in obtaining a loan, or if he had created and issued new stock, and that stock passed from hand to hand, circulating in all the markets of Europe, what harm would they do to the Emperor of Russia by preventing a British mercantile house from receiving a portion of the stock as collateral security for a bond fide debt, which they might lose if they were not permitted to take that description of stock? If the Amendments which he suggested were introduced in the Bill, every objection would be disposed of, because the effect would be this: they would prohibit the subscribing to a loan, and they would prohibit the purchase of stock, but they would leave British merchants to become possessed of stock once in the market, in any way, in the course of commercial operations.

Clause—

"That, during the continuance of hostilities between Her Majesty and the Emperor of Russia, any person who shall wilfully or knowingly subscribe to or for, or purchase or take in exchange, any Loan, Stocks, Funds, Scrip, Bonds, or Debentures, which, since the 29th day of March, 1854, have or hath been, or which, during the continuance of hostilities as aforesaid, shall be negotiated, created, entered into, or secured by or in the name of the Government of Russia, or any person or persons on its behalf, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and in Scotland of an offence punishable with fine and imprisonment; and the Central Criminal Court shall have jurisdiction to try any offence against this Act, committed elsewhere than in the United Kingdom, and the indictment may be framed, and the venue laid, as if such offence had been committed in the county of Middlesex: Provided always, that this Act shall not extend to any subscription or purchase effected or made in any foreign country by any commercial house or firm trading and having a place of business in any foreign country, and wherein one or more British subjects, and one or more aliens, are partners, or jointly interested."

Brought up, and read 1^o.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be now read a second time."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, the hon. and learned Gentleman had expressed surprise that the Bill, as it was worded, was not levelled at direct subscriptions to the Emperor of Russia. Now, the law already provided that the direct advance of money to an enemy would be an offence of high treason, and he did not think it would be at all suitable to the temper and disposition of the House to have that law so entirely altered as it would be by condoning that offence, and making it only a misdemeanor. This was the reason why the Bill, as altered by him, did not extend to subscriptions or loans. His

hon. and learned Friend had failed to observe that by his Amendment he left the second clause of the Bill remaining, so that there would be this contradictory effect—that his hon. and learned Friend first of all reduced the offence of subscribing money directly down to simple misdemeanor, and then the next clause provided that nothing contained in the Bill should have the effect of reducing the offence from high treason to misdemeanor. The one clause, therefore, would stultify the other. With regard to the clause itself, his hon. and learned Friend proposed to permit a wilful and knowing subscription to a loan for the Emperor of Russia, provided it were made in any foreign house, although in that foreign house there might be one or more British subjects as partners. Now, the effect of this would be to cast a perfect air of ridicule upon the whole of this piece of attempted legislation. The result of such an Amendment would be, that any persons in England desiring to participate in loans to the Emperor of Russia would have nothing in the world to do but to send over to some foreign firm and say, "We will become partners pro hac vice in the business of the loan." In this way an infinitesimal share in the loan in question might be given to the foreign house, reserving all the important part of the transaction for the benefit of British subjects; and such a transaction, though a palpable evasion of the Act, would, under the proposed clause, be perfectly legal and liable to no punishment. Now (if the House were to legislate at all upon this subject—as to the propriety of which he said nothing)—undoubtedly the Bill should be so expressed as not to be rendered ridiculous by its own wording, and so as not to open, nay, even to point out, the very door by which an offender might escape from the operation of the Act. The result of his hon. and learned Friend's Amendment would be to dilute and reduce down to a state of utter weakness the wine which the Committee had already mixed, the colour and strength of which should at least be retained, and not watered down in the way proposed by his hon. and learned Friend. With regard to the proviso suggested, although he was by no means enamoured of the Bill, or of the language of the Bill, he thought it more accurately worded than his hon. and learned Friend would make it, and he should, therefore, oppose the Amendment.

Mr. HUME said, he had not been present upon former stages of the Bill, and was anxious, therefore, to say a few words respecting it. No doubt, the intentions with which the Bill had been brought forward were good. If by any piece of legislation they could cripple the Emperor of Russia, and prevent him from obtaining the means of carrying on a war opposed both to justice and to reason, he would entirely approve of such a measure. But he doubted whether they could effect this object in any such way as was now proposed. He thought, too, that what they were attempting to do with regard to one country they should apply to all. For this reason, he should be very sorry to see such a piece of legislation as this carried out, because it might appear an act of revenge, as well as one which would not effect anything. It was clear from the speech of the hon. and learned Solicitor General that the proposition of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Sir F. Kelly), instead of amending the Bill, would dilute it and render it of much less value. He would suggest, however, to the noble Lord (Lord John Russell), who, he thought, had rather hastily taken the measure out of the hands of his noble Friend (Lord D. Stuart), whether, under all the circumstances, it would not be better to drop the Bill for the present. He certainly thought the House would do well not to proceed further with the Bill.

LORD DUDLEY STUART said, the gist of the arguments against this measure was, that it would interfere with the transactions of trade and commerce. Now there was not the slightest doubt that it would do so; and he quite admitted that this was an evil; but the object it was desired to frustrate was an evil still greater. To carry out the views of the opponents of this Bill, they should propose the abolition of the law of high treason as to this matter, and leave it perfectly open to any one who chose to lend money or give whatever other aid he pleased to the enemy. It had been triumphantly asked, "What do you want with such a measure as this? Why, the committee of the Stock Exchange have settled the matter for you. That patriotic and magnanimous body have prohibited the negotiation of any new Russian loan or shares of loan upon the Stock Exchange, and the thing is thus done to your hands." The fact, however, was, that the Stock Exchange Committee had done nothing of the sort, so there was an end of that argument. Another argument which had been much urged was, that no respectable or well-principled person would have anything to do with any loans to Russia while she was at war with this country, and that, therefore, this Bill was needless. The argument would sound very well if everybody concerned with loan transactions was respectable and well principled, but it was very far from clear that such was the case, and laws were required precisely for those who were not respectable and well principled. It must certainly be admitted that no Bill had ever been so abused as this Bill had been, but that abuse had not prevented it being passed through three stages by majorities of three to one, and he trusted that its final stage would be sanctioned by a majority equally decided.

MR. WILKINSON said, he had a very great respect for the noble Lord, who was the grandfather of the Bill; but he believed that it was a measure that would be entirely useless. He certainly did not approve of the alterations proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir F. Kelly). He objected to the principle of the measure, and he hoped the credit of the House would not be damaged by passing such a Bill. With regard to the Stock Exchange, it was not their business to interfere with international law. What they had done was to pass a rule for the benefit of their own subscribers. The rule made by the committee of the Stock Exchange was that they would not sanction or take cognisance of any bargains, in loans, bonds, stock, or other securities, issued by foreign Governments, that had not paid their dividends on former loans.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, according to the argument that they should principally regard the advantages to trade and commerce, it would seem very hard that any one lending money to the Russian Government should be deemed guilty of high treason. No doubt it would be favourable to persons in this country to lend money to the Emperor of Russia, yet by law that was high treason. Those who regarded simply the advantage of trade and commerce, might as well say that was very cruel, and ought to be altered. At all events, he did not think it would be advisable to adopt the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for East Suffolk. The hon. and learned Gentleman had proposed to lower the crime of subscribing to the Russian loan during the continuance of the war, which was one of high treason according to the present law, to one of misdemeanor, and he had also proposed a proviso, by which the Act was not to apply to any subscriptions or purchase made in any foreign country by any commercial house having its establishment in such foreign country, nor to any British subject who might be a partner in such commercial house. It seemed to him that this would open an obvious door of evasion; because under it a person would be able to subscribe to a loan, or to purchase stock, through the medium of a foreign firm in which he might be a partner, and to supply the chief part of the capital from this country, escaping, nevertheless, the penalties imposed by this Bill. It was said that it was very hard that a person should be liable to penalties for transactions in a foreign country by a firm of which he might be a member, but which he might not be able to control. A person, however, might be a partner in a foreign firm which might think it a good speculation to fit out a privateer, furnished by the fund of a firm; and it might be said in that case, as it had been said in this, that it would be very hard to make him liable for proceedings which his interest in the firm might not be sufficient to enable him to prevent. Nevertheless, if he were a British subject, he would no doubt be liable to penalties for being engaged in sending out a privateer against Her Majesty and against British commerce. He thought that with respect to this Bill, although it might not effect any great advantage, the principle was good, and he hoped the House would consent to pass it.

Question, "That the said Clause be now read a second time," put, and negatived.

The second Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentlemen was also negatived.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Bill do pass."

The House divided:—Ayes 51; Noes 13: Majority 38.

Bill passed.

The House adjourned at Seven o'clock.

EPISCOPAL AND CAPITULAR ESTATES MANAGEMENT (1854) BILL.

Commons Amendments considered (according to Order).

THE BISHOP OF LONDON hoped that their Lordships would not agree with all the Amendments, as he considered some of them injurious in their operation, especially the clause relating to the computation of the duration of lives, which he thought ought not to be made at a uniform rate of interest. The Amendments intended to carry into effect a principle embodied in a Report which their Lordships had rejected on a former occasion. The lessees, he thought, had no ground of complaint; and under the present system no less than 621 estates had been enfranchised in a satisfactory manner. He thought, therefore, they ought not to consent to any alteration in that system, especially as at this period of the Session they could not proceed to a minute discussion of the Amendments.

THE EARL OF CHICHESTER also opposed the Amendments, on much the same ground as had been stated by the right rev. Prelate—namely, that they sought to introduce into an Act which was intended to facilitate the enfranchisement of church property a compulsory power with respect to arbitration; and anything which had that effect was highly objectionable. He particularly opposed the mode of computation provided in the Clause H—namely, that laid down by the Episcopal and Capitular Revenues Commissioners in their Report of 1850.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he could not deny that there was considerable force in the objections which the right rev. Prelate had stated to the clause relating to the computations on the duration of lives, and he should, therefore, be ready to amend it by the omission of the words "and such computation shall be made throughout at a uniform rate of interest," as suggested by the right rev. Prelate. He must say he did not see any force in the objections taken by the noble Earl (the Earl of Chichester) to the clause rendering arbitration compulsory in cases where proposals for enfranchisement were made to the Commissioners, especially as the noble

Earl expressly assented to arbitration being made permissive.

Clause amended.

THE EARL OF CHICHESTER moved to strike out certain words in Clause H, which would have the effect of leaving the clause as follows—

"In computing the due regard to be paid to the just and reasonable claims of the present holders of lands under lease or otherwise, arising from the long-continued practice of renewal, the basis of compensation may, at the discretion and with the approval of the Church Estates Commissioners, be according to the recommendations laid down in the Lords' Report on the same subject in 1851."

On Motion that the clause, as originally worded, stand part of the Bill, their Lordships divided:—Content 16; Not Content 11: Majority 5.

Amendment negatived.

Several Amendments agreed to; other Amendments agreed to, with Amendments; and other Amendments objected to; and (after Debate) agreed to, with Amendments; and Bill, with the Amendments, returned to the Commons.

PUBLIC REVENUE AND CONSOLIDATED FUND CHARGES (No. 2) BILL.

EARL GRANVILLE moved to resolve—

"That inasmuch as the Provisions of the Public Revenue and Consolidated Fund Charges (No. 2) Bill are precisely similar to those of the Public Revenue and Consolidated Fund Charges Bill as the same were amended in Committee in this House, the Report of which Amendments was, on the 29th day of July, ordered to be received that Day Three Months, the peculiar Circumstances under which the said (No. 2) Bill has been sent to this House from the House of Commons is it reasonable that the same be allowed to be read a Second Time this Day, if the House shall think fit so to order."

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, and for Standing Orders Nos. 37 and 38 to be considered, in order to their being dispensed with on the said Bill, read.

On Question, agreed to.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, that the loose manner in which Bills emanating from various departments of the Government were often drawn, led him to ask with whom the official responsibility rested? This might be excusable in private Members, but it certainly was not in the Government, who had the means of procuring the requisite legal assistance. A striking instance of the carelessness of which he complained was afforded by the former Bill on this subject, which, as originally drawn, actually rendered the salaries of the Judges subject to an annual Vote. This appeared to be so monstrous that while the Bill was still in the House of Commons he communicated with his noble and learned Friend on the woolsack upon the subject, and the objectionable provision was in consequence struck out. The Bill, however, even as it came up to their Lordships, was still calculated to do injustice in many quarters, and especially in that part of the country with which he (the Marquess of Clanricarde) was more immediately connected. It was, however, materially improved by the Select Committee to which it was sent.

EARL GRANVILLE thought the noble Marquess had overstated the nature of the inaccuracies in the Bill, which, generally speaking, were merely of a verbal character. The only Amendments which involved a question of policy was, as to whether the Commissioners of Lunacy and the police magistrates should be included in the schedule.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, that when the Bill was introduced, the Master of the Rolls and Masters of Chancery in Ireland were actually made subject to an annual Vote; and that could not be considered as a mere verbal inaccuracy or mistake.

LORD MONTEAGLE said, there were eight instances in one of the schedules of the Bill in which provision was authorised to be made for certain charges, "&c.," and the word "ditto" was frequently repeated, without there being any possibility of interpreting the meaning to be attached to the word. Was this at all desirable, or to be tolerated in a Bill dealing with the appropriation of the public money? In the original Bill the official conduct of the officers of the Irish courts of law was rendered liable to be canvassed annually in a Committee of Supply, and the Government had not given way upon the matter until they found themselves in a minority, when they agreed to adopt the Bill as it now stood. He rejoiced to find that the Committee throughout had taken a different view of the case. But this was far from being all, for it was the intention of the framers of the Bill to include in it the police magistrates of London, and that intention was not carried out only in consequence of an adverse vote. In fact, the Bill had been prepared with such want of consideration and justice, that no reserve whatever was made for the life interest of persons holding office during good behaviour, and it was only by a vote of Parliament that a saving clause was inserted. There were considerable objections to the Bill as it stood; but at that late period of the Session he was not desirous of proposing any Amendment, or of throwing any difficulties in the way of Government; but several alterations might be made which would be of a beneficial character. In some cases the Statutes had been inaccurately referred to. He would merely mention one instance, where a Statute was referred to under the head of "Scotch Clergy," when, instead of referring to the Scotch clergy, it related to the custody of offenders. In fact, he could call attention to several Statutes, showing, if he might use so unparliamentary a term, the "slip-slop" manner in which the whole of the Bill had been drawn. A high authority in another place said—

"The Committee of the House of Lords had made a very injudicious charge on very insufficient grounds. They reported that they had not before them sufficient information to enable them to determine whether these pensions, superannuations, and similar charges ought to remain on the Consolidated Fund, or to be voted on the annual Estimates; and then, instead of sending to the Treasury for farther information, they struck these items out of the schedule. The House must come back to the subject, and make cleaner work at a future time."

Now, in answer to this statement, he must be allowed to say, that he had applied to the public officers of the Treasury to know whom he was to ask for any documentary evidence which it might be necessary to consult, and he had made an application at the Treasury for the very information which was wanting, and which their Lordships were complained of for not asking for. The answer which was given to his application was, that they had no authority to furnish the information he required, but they would apply for authority to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The next day the Chancellor of the Exchequer was applied to, and he declined to furnish the information. He (Lord Montague) certainly felt himself called on to complain, that after the information had been asked for and refused by the head of the Treasury Board himself, the absence of that information, and the supposed neglect of the Committee, should be made a ground of complaint against them. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said in another place—

"In the case of charges involving any great political question, or appearing to involve a question of good faith and of public contract, in which vested interests, which might fairly be so called, were concerned, he had left on the Consolidated Fund whatever he had found upon it."

As bearing upon this point, he (Lord Montague) might mention the case of Mr. Augustus Stapleton. Mr. Stapleton was private secretary to the late Mr. Canning; and on the death of Mr. Canning, George IV. applied by letter to Lord Ripon, the head of the succeeding Government, to make some provision for Mr. Stapleton, on the ground of the affection which His Majesty had entertained towards Mr. Canning. Mr. Stapleton was in consequence appointed to the office of Commissioner of Customs, at a salary of 1,400*l.* a year, and he held, in addition, two small offices in the West Indies, which increased his emoluments to 1,900*l.* a year. When Earl Grey's Government came into office a large reduction was made in the expenditure of the Revenue Board; and upon an application being made to Mr. Stapleton, he agreed to resign the three offices which he then held, in consideration of a retiring allowance of 900*l.* a year. This sum was granted by the Government of the late Earl Grey, and, in consequence of the arrangement, a sum of 21,000*l.* had been saved to the country, and Mr. Stapleton, under peculiar circumstances, had been in the receipt of 900*l.* a year. The peculiar circumstances were, that Mr. Stapleton had himself sought to be relieved from the position of being a mere incumbrance upon the public, and had applied to successive Governments to give him employment in consideration of his retiring allowance. Now, he was quite satisfied that there was not one of their Lordships who would hesitate to express an opinion that the engagement with Mr. Stapleton was one which ought not to be broken. It was certainly a case which came within the speech of Mr. Gladstone, and was a case of good faith and contract, by which the public had effected a saving of 21,000*l.* in the interval between entering into the contract and the time at which it was proposed to throw Mr. Stapleton's allowance upon the Committee of Supply. It might be said that reliance should be placed upon the justice of the House of Commons; but he was not disposed to trust more to the House of Commons than to any other fallible persons; and not only must a reliance be placed upon the justice of the House of Commons, but they would have to depend upon the discretion or indiscretion of the Government of the day. In the course of this very Session, the salary paid to the Bishop of New Zealand had been withdrawn by the Government, though he had not the least doubt that the House of Commons would most willingly have agreed to its continuance. He did not think their Lordships had acted upon an unwise principle when they said that they would have evidence upon the whole matter before they came to a vote upon it; but, on the contrary, he thought they were quite right in the course they had taken, and that they had done good service to the public in the changes which they had introduced into the Bill. He would here take the liberty of referring to a report which was being circulated, to the effect that there was an intention to transfer to a Select Committee of the House of Commons the financial business of the country. If it were really true that such an intention existed, he thought it would be a greater change in the constitution and free institutions of England than had ever yet been propounded. At present the House of Commons, in its collective capacity as the Commons of England, had the power of considering its Estimates and of voting its money, and the moment it brought itself to transfer to a Select Committee functions of that description, its constitutional rights—its power over the public purse—would be lost, its proceedings would be conducted without deliberation and responsibility, and the financial business of the country would be conducted upon a similar plan to the bureau scheme of foreign countries, instead of by an open system of examination and deliberation.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that as there were several Members of the Select Committee present he would leave them to say whether he had given an accurate description of the Bill, or whether it was such a monstrosity as had been described to them. With regard to one example which the noble Lord had given for the purpose or showing that it was an imperfect measure, it regarded a matter of Scotch law. Now, he (Earl Granville) must say that, although he might be willing to take the noble Lord as an authority on a question of Irish law, he was certainly disinclined to accept it upon matters affecting the Scotch law. His noble Friend said that the most unfounded accusation had been brought against the Select Committee of their Lordships' House, because, so far from their having been able to obtain information to enable them to judge of the justice or injustice of particular items, his noble Friend himself applied to the Treasury for information, and was refused it. His noble Friend, with his usual courtesy, had given him (Earl Granville) notice of his intention to bring forward this subject; and he had, therefore, been enabled to ascertain the facts of the case. It appeared that his noble Friend had had some communication with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and that the latter, in answer to a question put to him, stated to his noble Friend that the persons most competent to give information on the subject of this Bill were two gentlemen of the names of Anderson and Shelley, engaged in the Treasury. He found that his noble Friend then wrote to Mr. Shelley, and requested both him and Mr. Anderson to call on him and bring the papers relating to the Bill. [Lord MONTEAGLE explained that he did not ask them to bring papers with them.] At all events, his noble Friend asked them for information respecting the Bill, and his noble Friend began his letter by saying that he had been authorised by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to do so. The answer of Mr. Shelley was, that he and Mr. Anderson would be most happy to call on the noble Lord, but requested that he would be good enough to specify what papers he desired. His noble Friend then replied, that it was a matter of no consequence, that he had only written the note to save time, that the Committee would meet the same afternoon, and would determine what papers it would call for. However, next day his noble Friend called on these gentlemen, and asked somewhat vaguely for information, and, thinking that he had the authority of the Chancellor of the Exchequer for doing so, they afforded him certain information. It was true that when his noble Friend asked them to give him the Estimates, which had not then been laid before the House of Commons, they told him that to furnish them was beyond their discretion, and that they must refer to the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the subject; and when the matter was mentioned to that right hon. Gentleman, he directed them not to give the Estimates to any one single Member of Parliament. In a conversation he (Earl Granville) had had with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the latter assured him that when the noble Lord asked him as to the proper source of information, he had no notion that the noble Lord intended to go and ask for this particular information, he being hostile to the Bill and to the Government proposals; at the same time it never entered the head of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to withhold any information from a Committee of their Lordships' House. Whilst the Government were, of course, bound to give information to both Houses of Parliament, and to any Select Committee, he did not think they were bound to allow their subordinates to give official information privately to any Member who might wish to select weak points for attack, and entirely pass over the strong points of the case, and thus to place himself in a position infinitely superior to that of the person who had to defend the Bill, and who was left uninformed as to the exact course which such an adverse Member meant to take. Now, they must all admire the zeal which his noble Friend displayed in any cause which he undertook, and knew that no one was more accurately acquainted than his noble Friend with the particulars contained in Parliamentary documents; but they knew at the same time nobody was so skilful in extracting information for the purpose he had in hand both from friend and foe. He meant no offence to his noble Friend by making this remark; but he could not help mentioning the circumstance that when he (Earl Granville) was at the Board of Trade, and when on one occasion his noble Friend meant to attack that department, with regard to some particular question, he found his noble Friend closeted with the secretary of the Board one hour before the debate was to come on. It was obvious that by seeking information in this manner the noble Lord placed the Minister who had to oppose him in a very unfair and unequal position. He had also heard it commonly stated that a certain witness, who was likely to be subjected to cross-examination in a Select Committee by his noble Friend, boasted of his presence of mind in having declined an invitation to breakfast he had received from his noble Friend for the morning of the day on which he was to give evidence; and the party invited said that he would be most happy to breakfast with his noble Friend on any day subsequent to his examination. His noble Friend had that night made reference to a rumour which he said had reached him regarding the intentions of the Government and of the other House. He (Earl Granville) had heard of other idle rumours, with which, however, he would not trouble their Lordships. One, concerning the relations of the Government and the Bank of England, was a case in point, and had been most completely refuted when the proper time came for it. He did not happen to have heard this rumour to which his noble Friend now alluded; but he would only say, when mere rumours, without any substance in them, were brought forward for the purpose of an attack, that he must in future decline either to defend or to deny them until some more tangible and definite ground was laid before the House.

LORD MONTEAGLE replied. He said that it was true he went to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for information relating to the subject of the Committee's inquiry; but he was not aware that he had taken a course in any way unusual. During the time he had held office there had always been an officer at the Treasury to meet inquiries made there, and to whom every Member of Parliament made application as to whether such and such a paper could be granted or not; and it was a ground of constant complaint on the part of the Government that Motions were made for papers without previous inquiries being made as to whether they could be produced.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he could not allow the discussion to close without entering his protest against the fairness of the account of the transactions in the Select Committee given by both the noble Lord who spoke last and the noble Mar-guess (the Marquess of Clanricarde). The question having been referred to a Select Committee, the Government were defeated in the Committee, and various alterations and amendments were made in the Bill. But these various amendments were made solely upon grounds of policy, and not, as noble Lords had said, because blunders had been discovered in the drawing and printing of the Bill, or because the Government had sought in any case to violate the principle of the measure.

LORD CAMPBELL said, that as it had been intimated that something very sweeping was to be done hereafter, he must express a hope that the Government would proceed with the greatest caution and deliberation, for he was inclined to think that, so far as they had gone, there had been, per incuriam, some departure from the principle of this Bill, as originally laid down. With all the respect that he entertained for the privileges of the other House, he thought there were functions which it could not constitutionally exercise, and the assumption of which by that House must lead to very mischievous consequences. The House of Commons was a legislative and inquisitorial, but not an executive body, and it could not undertake executive functions with advantage to the country. He understood that the foremost man in that House, whom they all regarded with respect and admiration, had expressed great alarm at any increase of its functions. He did not think that the House of Commons was at all fitted to determine every year what the salary of every functionary should be, nor was it expedient, after both Houses had with due deliberation fixed the salary of a particular office, that that salary should be transferred from the Consolidated Fund to the annual Votes, and that the House of Commons should every year be called on to decide what should be the amount of that salary, and whether the officer had that year done his duty properly. The House of Commons had not time to perform the duties imposed upon it by the constitution, and it would be far better that the salaries should be paid by the Treasury than by the House of Commons.

PUBLIC HEALTH BILL.

EARL GRANVILLE moved to resolve—

“That as the Public Health Bill constitutes a new Board of Health, inasmuch as Cholera exists in many parts of the Kingdom, and various sanitary Regulations which can only be carried out effectually by the said Board imperatively are required, the Circumstances which render Legislation on the Matter of the said Bill expedient are of such Urgency as to render the immediate Consideration of the said Bill necessary; and it is therefore reasonable that the same be allowed to be read a Second Time this Day, if the House should think fit so to order.”

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, that the law under which the Board of Health was constituted would expire at the end of the present Session of Parliament; and that the necessity for the present measure was rendered the more urgent by the increase which had taken place in the mortality arising from cholera. The noble Earl stated that the deaths from these causes in the metropolis were, for the week ending July 15—Cholera, 5; Diarrhoea, 46; Total, 51; for the week ending July 22—Cholera, 26; Diarrhoea, 58; Total, 84; for the week ending July 29—Cholera, 133; Diarrhoea, 84; Total, 217; and for the week ending August 5—Cholera, 399; Diarrhoea, 148; Total, 547.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading; and for Standing Orders Nos. 37 and 38 to be considered, in order to their being dispensed with on the said Bill, and the Lords Summoned, read.

METROPOLITAN SEWERS BILL.

Moved to resolve—

“That as the Metropolitan Sewers Bill is necessary for the Continuance of the Powers of the Metropolitan Sewers Commission, and for increasing the Facilities for constructing Sewers, and as such Powers and Facilities are of essential Importance to the Public Health, especially in reference to the Existence of the Cholera in Parts of the Metropolis, the Circumstances of this Bill present such a Case of Urgency as to render necessary the immediate Consideration of the said Bill; and that accordingly the said Bill be allowed to be read a Second Time this Day, if the House shall think fit so to order.”

PUBLIC OFFICES.

LORD REDESDALE moved for a Return of all Houses, Buildings, &c., hired for official Purposes, including Crown Property, showing the Situation of each, the Term for which it is held, the Amount of Rent and Taxes with which it is chargeable, and the Purposes to which it is applied. His object was to call the attention of the Government, and also of the country, to the condition generally of the public offices, which, as they at present existed, were most inconvenient. There was but one locality in which they could be brought together with advantage to the public business and the appearance of the metropolis, as well as with a view to economy—of course, he meant by the erection of large buildings in the neighbourhood of Whitehall and Downing Street, which were conveniently situated with reference to the Houses of Parliament. The site to which he wished particularly to direct attention was the space extending from the back of Downing Street to the back of Great George Street, and which ran parallel with Parliament Street. That spot was covered with poor and very old buildings, much out of repair, most of which must shortly be pulled down ; and if they were rebuilt, the new buildings would, of course, greatly add to the value of the property, and therefore the present opportunity ought not to be lost in obtaining a plot of land so well adapted for the purposes of public offices before the value of the land increased. By the plan which he would suggest, Parliament Street might be made much wider by taking into it the space on which King Street now stood, and thus making a better and more convenient approach to the Houses of Parliament than now existed. He would suggest to the Government the expediency of obtaining this land as soon as possible, especially as it had been the subject of consideration for private speculation. He also wished to mention a matter having reference to the Duchy of Cornwall, and which was connected with a Bill which had been passed to enable the officers of the Duchy to obtain an office in lieu of the rooms they had vacated at Somerset House, for the accommodation of the Board of Inland Revenue. He wished to point out the position in which the Duchy of Cornwall was placed with reference to the accommodation of the Prince of Wales, whose residence, Marlborough House, was now occupied as a Picture Gallery and Museum of Practical Art. That residence would, probably, be soon wanted by the Prince of Wales ; and as it was probable it would suffer some dilapidations from its present uses, rendering it unfit for a residence, and as Burlington House had been recently purchased for the purpose of being converted into public offices, he would suggest whether it would not be desirable to exchange that building for Marlborough House, and assign it as a residence for the Prince of Wales ; while accommodation could also be found for the offices of the Duchy of Cornwall in the buildings in the court-yard of Burlington House. The residence of the Prince of Wales would then belong to the Duchy of Cornwall, and he thought that would be a better arrangement both for the Prince and the public. He hoped after the notice which he had taken of the matter, that Government would be able to consider it before Parliament met again, and if that should be so he would not have taken up their Lordships' time unprofitably.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, there could be no objection to granting the return moved for by the noble Lord. Indeed, so far from there being any objection to it, he was glad that it had been moved for, inasmuch as it would contain most useful information, to which the attention of Parliament might be advantageously directed. He did not, however, think it would be advisable to enter into any discussion upon his noble Friend's suggestions with respect to the appropriation of Burlington House ; nor should he enter at any length into the propriety of the very extensive purchase which his noble Friend had recommended between Downing Street and Great George Street. At the same time, he entirely agreed that it was of vast importance that all the principal offices of Government should be concentrated, for the more they could be brought into a position convenient to each other, the more conveniently and economically would the public business be discharged. Of this he was convinced, that the returns now moved for would establish beyond all question the exceedingly great inconvenience of the mode under which the public offices were at this moment conducted. While he agreed with his noble Friend in the abstract, it was also a question to be considered on economical grounds. He was not, he believed, far wrong when he stated that, independently of the offices held by the Crown in fee simple, there was now being paid annual rents for something more than fifty-six different offices. Of these fifty-six, only seven, he believed, were held of the Crown, and consequently rent was paid for the whole of the remainder to private individuals. He believed that 20,000*l.* a year was paid for rents by the Office of Woods and Forests alone. But there was not only an enormous sum paid for rents; a most extravagant system was adopted in consequence of the dispersed and inconvenient character of the buildings rented. These buildings had most of them been private houses, and therefore they were only suited for private families, and as a matter of course almost one-half the space was thrown away wastefully. But this was not all. There must be office-keepers and messengers to each. Messengers were kept running about, and undoubtedly, besides the rent, a considerable sum was annually expended in this way. And for what? Why, that the public business might be inconvenienced, and carried on with much less satisfaction to those who had the conduct of it, and with much less advantage to the public, than if a considerable sum were at once expended in the erection of new buildings, the interest on the capital of which he believed would be less than the amount annually paid for rent. To afford their Lordships some idea of the inconvenience sustained under the present state of things, he would mention that, apart from the central office held by the Board of Trade which the President occupied, there were ten or eleven other offices elsewhere, in which the business of departments of the Board was carried on. It must be obvious that, under such circumstances, the President of the Board of Trade could not exercise control, or conduct business in a manner which the public had a right to require. The same observation applied to the War Department. He did not speak only of the great offices of the Horse Guards and the Ordnance, but of a number of small offices, such as the recruiting office, the medical inspector's office, the medical examination of recruits office, and others, all of which, being held in different buildings, were practically beyond that supervision and control by the Secretary at War, which the head of every department ought to have the means of exercising. The question, therefore, was not merely one of pounds, shillings, and pence, it was one of economy and efficiency; and for these reasons he believed it would be for the advantage of the public service that a considerable expenditure should be incurred for this purpose. The attention of the Government had been directed to the subject, but under existing circumstances he could give no pledge upon it. We were at this moment engaged in very expensive operations, and it must be matter for consideration how far it would be right or desirable to choose such a time for calling upon Parliament for such an expenditure. At the same time the expenditure would be right in itself, and he felt confident that the country would support any Government in proposing a Vote for this important object at the very earliest moment at which it could be proposed consistently with the other requisitions upon the people.

LORD REDESDALE thought it desirable that there should be no delay. It was important the Government should come to some determination by next Session, for the land with old buildings might be procured cheaper now than at a future time, when new ones might perhaps have been erected; and if Government determined to become possessed of the property, they might name a certain time within which they should be at liberty to conclude the purchase, so as not to render any immediate expenditure necessary. He did not think it reasonable to keep such a matter hanging over the heads of the holders of the property for a lengthened period, but he suggested that five years might not be thought too long a time; and even if Government should pay the price at once, they need not pull down the houses, but might let them, and the rents would be more than sufficient to pay the interest of the money expended.

NAWAB OF SURAT—QUESTION.

SIR ERSKINE PERRY said, he had given notice of a question with reference to the conduct of the Governor of Bombay towards the family of the Nawab of Surat, which it would be expedient for him to preface by a short statement of the case. The late Nawab of Surat had made over his territories to the East India Company upon a stipulated pension for himself and his family of 15,000*l.* per annum, reserving to himself rights of sovereignty over his immediate family and dependents. This state of things ceased with his death, upon which event some difficulties arose in connection with his representative, a daughter. In consequence, an Act of the Supreme Legislature of India was placed in 1848 for the administration of the estate of the late Nawab of Surat, to continue privileges to his family. By section 2 of that Act, the Governor of Bombay in Council was empowered to act in the administration of the property of whatever nature, left by the late Nawab of Surat, &c., and no act of the said Governor of Bombay in Council in respect to the administration to, and distribution of such property was to be liable to be questioned in any court of law or equity. The Governor of Bombay in Council, having proceeded to act in execution of the powers thus conferred upon him, had exercised that power in a manner not satisfactory to a member of the family of the Nawab, and, in consequence, that member of the family sought to have the proceeding reheard or the distribution thought right by the Governor of Bombay in Council brought under the review of the Judicial Council, as a matter of right, and in the exercise of its ordinary administration. The Judicial Council, however, by the mouth of Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce, held that under the third section of the Act, under which they sat, the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the appeal, because the Legislature of India had framed an Act enabling the Government of Bombay to deal with the subject-matter in his executive capacity, and not in a judicial manner, but that they had jurisdiction in the matter, if Her Majesty should be pleased to refer it to them. And he said—

VOL. CXXXV. [THIRD SERIES.]

“ In the extreme case which may be supposed of corrupt or tyrannical abuse of such powers as these—which is not suggested—there must always be open to all the Queen's subjects those rights of complaint—in the last resort, either to Parliament or to the Crown—neither Parliament nor the Crown ever being deaf, we must assume and believe, to the voice of reason and abstract justice.”

The petitioner, therefore, was left to take such course as he might be advised, with reference to an application to the Crown, through the Board of Control, or otherwise. Under these circumstances, he (Sir E. Perry) begged to put the question of which he had given notice, whether, as the Privy Council have decided that the determination of the Governor of Bombay in Council against the claim of the daughter and only surviving child of the late Nawab of Surat to succeed to his private property was an executive and not a judicial act, the Board of Control will take the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, whether the judgment of Mr. Frere, on which the decision of the Bombay Government has proceeded, is not a fit matter to be referred to the Privy Council for their opinion as to its soundness in point of law and its conformity with the evidence in the case—whether, if an Act of the Legislature of India takes away from any subject of Her Majesty the right of appeal to any court of law or equity, there are any means by which such individual complaining of injustice can obtain redress?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he did not see any necessity that existed for taking the opinion of the law officers of the Crown on a question which had been decided in so distinct and formal a manner; nor did he see that there were any means of meeting the views indicated in the latter part of the hon. Gentleman's question. The law which had been passed on the subject was a special law, rendered necessary by the difficulties which had arisen.

SIR ERSKINE PERRY said, he wished to know whether the right hon. Baronet would not consent, at least, to instruct the Governor of Bombay to suspend the distribution of the property until the opportunity of remedying the grievance by an appeal to that House, or otherwise, had been afforded?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, the property, he believed, had already been distributed.

SIR ERSKINE PERRY had reason to believe that it had not yet been distributed.

2 Z

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he would take that opportunity of giving notice that he should, early next Session, call the attention of the House to the propriety of taking some steps by which the grievances arising out of such legislation in India should be averted for the future.

MR. BRIGHT said, he was of opinion that some competent tribunal should be created for the special disposal of these cases, and with adequate powers. Some such tribunal had been advocated by Sir Robert Peel in 1834, and it would prevent a great deal of oppression and injustice towards our Indian fellow-subjects.

BRIBERY BILL.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL moved that the House should take into its consideration the Lords' Amendments in this Bill.

LORD HOTHAM said, he begged to ask Mr. Speaker whether it was competent for the noble Lord to bring the subject under their notice at that moment. There stood upon the paper a number of Orders of the Day, while the Motion of the noble Lord was placed upon the paper in the shape of a notice.

MR. SPEAKER said, that previous to the establishment of a rule to which the House had some time ago agreed, the Amendments introduced by the Lords into a Bill might be taken into consideration at any time. That rule, however, had provided that the Lords' Amendments should not be taken into consideration upon the day upon which they came down from the other House, but should be fixed for some subsequent day, unless the House was pleased to order otherwise. It was competent, however, for the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell), having given notice of Motion upon the subject, to move that those Amendments be taken into consideration forthwith.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that a general assent had been given by the other House of Parliament to the Bill as it had been sent up to them from the House of Commons. The important definitions of bribery and treating and undue influence, and the important provision which related to the appointment of an election officer, had undergone no alteration. The last day upon which the Bill had been considered in that House a former decision of the House had been reversed—he meant that with respect to the declaration to be taken by hon. Members at the table. It had then been asked whether it was not competent to expunge those other declarations in the Bill which were consequent upon the principal one. They had been informed, however, from the Chair that it was then too late to take those other declarations into their consideration. Now, in the House of Lords those declarations had been struck out. An important clause, Clause 23, legalising the payment of travelling expenses to the voter, had also been struck out by the House of Lords. He himself had proposed that clause to the House, in the belief that it was desirable to confirm the law as it at present stood. The House would bear in mind, however, that the necessity for the clause in question depended in some measure upon the declaration to be taken by Members of Parliament, and that declaration having been struck out, the clause with respect to travelling expenses no longer retained its former value. He proposed that that House should agree to the omission of this clause. No doubt, when a declaration was to be required from every Member of that House that he had not incurred any illegal expenses, it was most essential that there should be a particular definition of what expenses were or were not illegal, but that declaration had been struck out. The only effect of agreeing to this Amendment was, that the law would remain in its present state; but he might say that, while this Bill treated one part of the subject of bribery and corruption, there was another part of the subject—namely, that which referred to the trial of offences before Election Committees; and he hoped to be able to deal with that subject during the next Session of Parliament.

LORD HOTHAM said, he still retained all those objections to the Bill which he had urged against it upon the third reading, but he should not upon the present occasion enter into a recapitulation of those objections. The course he meant to take was to call the attention of the House to the manner in which, and to the time at which, the House of Commons was called upon to take into consideration the subject of the noble Lord's Motion. For his own part he must say that he had never yet, during the time he had sat in that House, seen a Minister ask the concurrence of the House to an Amendment against which, in conjunction with his colleagues, he had spoken and voted. The present Bill had undergone considerable discussion in that House, and also the severe scrutiny of a Select Committee—and, indeed, the consideration of it could not be concluded before the day arrived after which the Lords had determined not to receive any more Bills from that House. They had, however, for various reasons, consented to take this Bill into discussion, and among other reasons stated was a feeling of deference to the opinion of that House.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I understand that the noble Lord is about to enter into a detail of the proceedings with respect to this Bill which took place in the other House; but the proceedings which have taken place there, in Committee, with regard to it, are not properly matter for discussion in this House.

LORD HOTHAM: The noble Lord was perhaps justified in calling him to order; but he thought that the noble Lord himself, in asking the House to consider what had never been printed, and of which they had no Parliamentary knowledge, was scarcely taking a legitimate course. The clause to whose omission from the Bill the noble Lord now asked them to give their assent, was one which had been considered upon no less than five different occasions, and upon every one of those occasions the noble Lord had either spoken or voted in its favour. The whole force of the Government had, in fact, been arrayed in support of it; and yet the noble Lord had no hesitation in asking the House of Commons to sanction its removal from the Bill. It was vain to say that to reject this Amendment would only leave the law in the same condition as it at present was, for surely it was not unreasonable, on the part of those who desired to see the law settled with regard to this subject, to complain of its being left in its present state. He contended that if the House consented under any pretence to the proposal of the omission of this clause, they would expose themselves to the scorn and contempt of every man throughout the country. What, then, was to be done under the present peculiar circumstances? To take the sense of the House would be a perfect absurdity, for, at that advanced period of the Session, when very few hon. Members besides Members of the Government were in London, the Government would, he was well aware, be able to carry any measure they pleased to bring forward, even if it were a proposal to make bribery at elections a capital offence. He scarcely knew what course he should take in order to resist the unjustifiable attempt of the noble Lord to reverse the decision at which the House of Commons had arrived. He must, sorry as he should be to be compelled to do so, if the noble Lord persisted in asking the House to assent to the omission of the clause in question, adopt a mode of proceeding the object of which was to protect that House from an improper interference with its action, let that interference come from whatever quarter it might. During the long period which he had sat in that House he had never felt it to be his duty to resort to the mode of proceeding to which he referred; but he had seen upon one occasion, no less than thirty divisions taken in Committee of Supply by the noble Lord's colleague, the late Lord Durham, and the last of those divisions had been taken on the question whether fresh candles should be lighted or not. There was a limit to all human endurance, and the present was an occasion upon which, he thought, the noble Lord might be considered to have passed that limit. The noble Lord, in fact, called upon the House of Commons to stultify itself by giving its assent to a proposition, the effect of which was to declare that it was prepared to act in a manner which would reflect disgrace upon its proceedings. Under these circumstances, he should implore of the noble Lord to reconsider the determination at which he seemed to have arrived, and not compel him, and those who might concur in his view of the matter, to have recourse to either one or the other of two alternatives — namely, either to take a course which it must be most repugnant to their feelings to adopt, or to make a pusillanimous and disgraceful surrender of the duty which they owed to their own consciences, to that House of which they were Members, and to those constituents whom they had the honour to represent. If the noble Lord, however, should persevere in the course which he had signified it to be his intention to pursue, then he (Lord Hotham), when they should have arrived at the 23rd clause, should move that the consideration of the Amendment of the House of Lords with respect to that clause be agreed to that day month.

Amendments agreed to, as far as Clause 23.

Amendment, to leave out Clause 23, read. Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said Amendment."

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the said Amendment be taken into further consideration upon this day month," instead thereof.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that the noble Lord seemed to consider that clause to be a very essential portion of the Bill; but the fact was that the Bill which he (Lord J. Russell) had introduced at the commencement of the Session had contained no such provision; and he believed that no such provision was to be found among the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midhurst (Mr. Walpole) and the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for East Suffolk (Sir F. Kelly). It certainly was not true that the adoption of such a clause had been regarded as one of the primary objects of the measure. But it was true that when they had been discussing the declaration clause, it had been strongly urged that if every Member were to be compelled to declare that he had incurred no expenses except legal expenses, they ought to define as exactly as possible what expenses were legal and what expenses were illegal; and it was in consequence of that argument that he had been induced to advise the House to agree to the clause then under their consideration. But he should confess that he thought the arguments used in that House against allowing candidates to pay election expenses had appeared to him very strong, and that they had certainly made a considerable impression upon his mind. It had been argued that by that clause they would open the door to many practices which should be clearly considered corrupt, and which were very akin to direct bribery. He could not help thinking that there was considerable weight in the objections thus put forward against the clause; and in his opinion it was desirable that they should agree with the Amendment of the Lords, and omit the clause from the Bill. It was not one of the essential provisions of the measure, although some hon. Members on both sides of the House had chosen so to represent it. If the House of Lords had undertaken to define what expenses should be legal, and what expenses should be illegal, he could understand that there would be some force in the objections advanced by the noble Lord against the course which the Lords had pursued, because the decision to which the House of Commons had come would then have been directly reversed by the other House. But the Lords had taken no such course; they had merely decided in favour of the omission of the clause; so that if the payment of travelling expenses had heretofore been legal, it would still continue legal under that Bill. It might be desirable that Parliament should come to some definite decision upon that point; but as the Bill now under consideration contained many other useful provisions—provisions, for instance, defining what was bribery, what was treating, what was undue influence, and providing for the appointment of an election officer with a view of ascertaining and limiting the expenses of elections, he thought that it was well worth the approval of the House, although it did not peremptorily deal with the question of the legality or the illegality of the payment of travelling expenses. He could not, therefore, conceive that the noble Lord could have any reason to say that that House would be at all disparaged by agreeing to that Amendment of the Lords. On the contrary, he was exceedingly glad that the Lords had not made any further Amendments in the Bill, and that in spite of the Resolution to which they had come, not to consider any Bills after the 25th of July, except Bills of Supply, or Bills of extreme urgency, they had thought proper to proceed with the present measure after that date. That fact showed that the House of Lords were more aware than the noble Lord (Lord Hotham) appeared to be of the urgency of that measure. It showed an earnest desire, on their parts, to put a check to those corrupt practices, and it likewise showed that they entertained very considerable deference for the wishes of the House of Commons, in which House the question of the propriety of issuing new writs for the five boroughs which had, for some time, remained unrepresented, was to be considered on Friday next. Under all the circumstances of the case, it appeared to him to be very desirable that the Bill should pass as soon as possible, and that if new writs were to be issued for Cambridge and the other unrepresented boroughs, they should have an opportunity of seeing whether the measure would be effectual in preventing that corruption by which those boroughs had hitherto been disgraced. He had, therefore, no hesitation in advising the House to agree to that Amendment of the Lords. He trusted that if the noble Lord opposite should divide the House upon that occasion, and if his Motion should be rejected, he would see that the feeling against those corrupt practices was so strong that it was not considered advisable that the House should delay until another Session some remedy against their recurrence.

MR. HILDYARD said, that the noble Lord President of the Council had addressed the House apparently under the supposition that the noble Lord the Member for the East Riding of Yorkshire (Lord Hotham) wished that the House should reject the Bill altogether. But he (Mr. Hildyard) did not certainly understand that that was the wish of the noble Lord.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that the Motion of the noble Lord was that the Amendment should be considered on that day month ; and the effect of its adoption would necessarily be to defeat the Bill for the present Session.

MR. HILDYARD said, that he was sure that if that would be the effect of the Motion his noble Friend would be prepared so to amend it as to show that he wished the Bill should pass at once, but should pass with the clause which had been struck out by the Lords. [Lord HOTHAM: Hear, hear!] The noble Lord the President of the Council had told them that that was a matter of no great importance ; but if it were a matter of only trifling importance, why should not the House of Lords coincide in a decision to which the House of Commons had come after prolonged deliberation? He said that that was an exercise of the privileges of the House of Lords which the Commons ought not to tolerate. In that case the Lords had thought proper to reverse a decision to which the House had come by very considerable majorities, and with the sanction of every noble Lord and right hon. Gentleman on the Treasury bench. Why should the Members of that House be subject to the caprice of the House of Lords? If that clause were struck out, the legality or the illegality of the payment by candidates of the travelling expenses of voters would still be left in doubt and different Committees of that House would be found deciding that question differently. It was only natural to suppose, however, that ultimately county Members would be deterred from incurring the risk of paying those travelling expenses, and then the poorer class of county voters would in many instances be virtually disfranchised. He hoped that the House would not, by adopting the Amendment, succumb to the caprice of the House of Lords, and that that House would not consent to the omission from the Bill of a clause to which they had before repeatedly given their sanction by large majorities.

MR. HUME said, it would appear from the language employed by the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just addressed them that the Liberals were at present the constitutional party in that House, and that the self-styled Conservatives were the enemies of the constitution. The doctrines laid down by the hon. and learned Gentleman would lead to a complete revolution in the constitution of this country. For his (Mr. Hume's) part, he had always defended the constitution as composed of King, Lords, and Commons ; and no man could be more anxious than he had always been that each of these bodies should perform its special duties in our legislative system. He had frequently complained that the Lords had overstepped their rights by sending Members to the House of Commons ; but he had never insulted them by complaining that they had exercised their undoubted privilege of dealing as they might think proper with any Bill that might be submitted to their consideration. If they were not to be allowed to exercise that privilege, why, he would ask, should measures be brought at all before them? He must confess at the same time that he attached but little importance to the Bill ; he had even abstained from taking any part in its discussion or in the divisions upon its various clauses ; and he had told the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) not only on this, but on similar occasions, that he believed the only effectual mode of putting a check to bribery at elections would be the adoption of the vote by ballot. He thought it only fair that Members of Parliament should not be saddled with the expense of bringing voters to the poll. He had no particular anxiety to see the franchise placed in the hands of men who would not be prepared to go to a polling-booth to record their votes ; and if the present polling-booths were too distant for any electors, he would only recommend that the number of polling-places should be increased, and that one of them should, if necessary, be erected in every parish. Under any circumstances he felt that a candidate ought not to be put to the expense of a single shilling in order to ensure his return to Parliament ; for he was but the servant of the public, and, as a servant, he ought not to be compelled to purchase his employment.

Mr. SPEAKER said, he felt it his duty to remind the noble Lord the Member for the East Riding of Yorkshire that his Amendment, if carried, would lead to the rejection of the Bill. If the noble Lord only objected to that particular Amendment of the Lords, he should merely move that the House should disagree to that Amendment.

LORD HOTHAM said, he felt it his duty to avail himself of every form of the House, not for the purpose of defeating the Bill, but for the purpose of ensuring the rejection of that Amendment of the Lords. If the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) would move that the House should disagree to the Amendment, and if that Motion should be adopted, he (Lord Hotham) should not offer the slightest opposition to the further progress of the Bill. His only wish was that it should remain in the state in which it had been sent up to the other House.

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE said, he understood the noble Lord to state that unless that clause were reinserted in the Bill he would obstruct the progress of the measure altogether. [Lord HOTHAM: Hear, hear!] That was a perfectly intelligible object, and for that object the Amendment of the noble Lord was a perfectly correct one. The noble Lord the Lord President of the Council had congratulated the House on the fact that the House of Lords had, in the case of the Bill now before them, waived the Resolution they had passed not to consider any Bill, except Bills of Supply, after the 25th of July. But he (Mr. Duncombe) saw no ground for congratulation in that circumstance. The Amendment which the Lords had made in striking out this clause was obviously a compromise. There was no question that the Government had been placed in a false position by the course which had been taken in this matter; but the House of Lords seemed desirous of placing the House of Commons in a false position of much more dangerous import by the Resolution under which they had sought to restrict the proceedings of that House. It appeared to him that the House of Commons would be deserting their duty to themselves and to the country were they to permit the Resolution of the House of Lords to become a precedent. It was a Resolution, moreover, which altogether trenched upon the prerogative of the Crown; for, supposing Her Majesty to have thought fit, instead of proroguing Parliament, to adjourn it for two or three months, was it to be permitted that the Lords should say they would not receive any of the Bills which might result from the resumed sitting, because they had not been brought up to their Lordships' House before the 25th of July in this year? He regarded the Resolution as altogether vicious, wrong, and unconstitutional. He perceived that the Lords had introduced another Amendment into the Bill, to the effect that it should continue in operation for a period of two years, and thence to the end of the next Session of Parliament; or, in other words, that it should remain in force for a period of three years. But as he (Mr. Duncombe) believed that the Bill was a trumpery and inefficient one, he meant to bring forward an Amendment to that proposal, and to move that the operation of the Bill should be limited to a period of twelve months. As this was intended to be an experimental measure, so also let the ballot be experimental.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, they had all heard that the views of hon. Members were often influenced to a greater extent than they were aware of by the side of the House on which they sat. He was glad the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Hume), who had so long sat on the sunny side of the House, should now feel disposed to give the benefit of his great experience and weight as a champion of the rights and privileges of the House of Lords. He thought, in his new character, the hon. Member could not do better than enter into a compact with the hon. Member for Finsbury, who had just attacked the House of Lords in a manner wholly undeserved because of its Resolution in reference to not receiving Bills after the 25th of July. Now, so far from having done anything unconstitutional, or anything that could be held to militate against the privileges of the Commons, the Lords never, in his opinion, took a course more wise or constitutional than in the case just mentioned. He was sorry Her Majesty's Government should take such an active part in putting aside a Resolution which was essential to the maintenance of the privileges of the House of Lords as an independent branch of the Legislature. What was the state of business in the House of Lords this time twelve months? The accumulations of Bills on their table was such that it was impossible they could give them attention. They were called upon in the month of August not to exercise an independent function, but to register whatever Bills the House of Commons might desire to crowd upon their table. He hoped in future Sessions the Lords would not only arrive at a similar Resolution, but that they would also adhere to it, as well as be supported by the House of Commons. As regarded the question now before the House, he should say it was not creditable to the character of the House; it was not a desirable or decorous proceeding that, in the middle of August, with a mere skeleton of the House present, they should be called upon to rescind and reverse the determination arrived at on so many occasions by a full House. It might be contended that if the Lords made Amendments in their Bills at so late a period of the Session, and sent them back, what else was to be done? But in the present case that had not happened. They found, on the contrary, a Member of the Government, in another place, proposing to reverse the resolution of the House of Commons—a resolution deliberately arrived at, and not alone deliberately arrived at, but also urged for adoption by the Government itself. The Government, therefore, were not in a position to urge on the House the necessity of the case, and, therefore, he should feel bound to vote with his noble Friend the Member for the East Riding of Yorkshire in the course he was taking. But they were told if the Amendment of his noble Friend were carried it would be fatal to the Bill. His noble Friend, however, had stated that such was not his object. However, he (Sir J. Pakington) agreed with the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. T. Duncombe) that if the result of the Amendment was to put an end to the measure in the present Session the loss would not be very great. He supported the Bill up to the last division, but he had no hesitation in avowing that upon that occasion the Bill was so mutilated and so altered for the worse, that he did not think it was desirable the Bill should pass; and his apprehension was that if the Bill should pass in its present shape, it would only be a delusion. He did not say that the Bill had no merits. It consolidated the laws relating to bribery, and it gave a better definition than they had yet had of what bribery was; but it was not intended for a Consolidation Bill, or a Bill for defining bribery, but as a Bill for putting an end to those scenes of bribery and corruption which had disgraced some recent elections; and in that important respect he believed that the Bill would be an utter delusion. Without a declaration to be taken by the successful candidates, he believed that the nomination of an election officer would be a perfectly useless appointment, and that the Legislature would fail in the great object which it had in view. Upon that ground he was prepared to give any vote which would impede the further progress of the Bill, and upon that ground he regretted that the Government thought it desirable to press it. He could have wished that, instead of carrying this now imperfect measure through Parliament, they had taken the recess to consider the subject, and at the commencement of the next Session had brought forward a well-digested measure, which might then have been deliberated upon and passed by both Houses.

MR. G. BUTT said, that it appeared to him the Bill, as it had come from the House of Lords, was, upon the whole, a useful measure. It certainly could not be denied that it contained many provisions calculated to carry into effect objects which Members of that House on both sides desired to have fulfilled. He would not go into the conflict between the House of Lords and the House of Commons, which had nothing to do with the question. The matter was, whether the Bill had sufficient merit in itself to entitle it to the adoption of the House as it now stood, and he thought it had. The noble Lord opposite had truly pointed out that in neither of the three Bills which had been submitted to the Select Committee had there been any clause which affected to deal with the question as to the legality of the payments to which this clause referred. It might be desirable, hereafter, to define what was legal and what was not in relation to such payments, but this future expediency afforded no reason why the present Bill should not pass—why another recess should pass away, and another Session, before any attempt was made to put down bribery and corruption. No doubt the Bill, as it came from the Committee was better than it was now, but let them take the measure as it stood, and let a short Bill be introduced next Session to supply any defect in the particular point under discussion, which it might be expedient to deal with.

MR. WILKINSON said, he had no faith in the Bill as a remedy for the evils of bribery, or in any legislative action by way of penalty. The only effectual way, in his opinion, of putting a stop to malpractices at elections would be to extend the franchise on the one hand, and adopt the system of the ballot on the other.

MR. CAYLEY said, he thought that the House of Lords was perfectly justified in the course they had taken. At all events, they had greatly improved this Bill, which he hoped would be passed in its present shape. He differed from the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. T. Duncombe) in thinking that the House of Lords did an unconstitutional act in passing their Resolution of the 2nd of May. That was a most useful Resolution, and one to which he hoped the House of Lords would adhere in future Sessions. With respect to the clause under discussion, he thought it would be inconsistent, and against all right principle, to call upon candidates to pay the travelling expenses of voters, and he should give his hearty support to the Lords' Amendments.

MR. MALINS said, he would beg the noble Lord the President of the Council to say, after the House of Commons had decided five times by large majorities that the actual and reasonable travelling expenses of voters should be paid by the candidates, and after every Member of the Government in that House had voted in favour of the clause to that effect, that the resolution to which the House had deliberately come should be set aside because the House of Lords had decided, upon a single night's debate upon the whole Bill, that the clause should be expunged. The effect of omitting the clause would be to leave the question of the legality or illegality of travelling expenses in a state of greater doubt and uncertainty than before; and it would be impossible either for an election officer or an Election Committee of that House to show how they were to deal with such cases. He thought that, instead of passing the Bill in its present imperfect and dangerous shape, it would be far better to delay it till next Session. But he would like the noble Lord the President of the Council to explain how it came to pass that a clause, which was supported in the House of Commons by all the Members of the Government in that House, was struck out on the Motion of another Member of the Government in the House of Lords. It could not be that the noble Duke acted without the knowledge or consent of his colleagues. He believed that in some matters the noble Duke did not allow the other Members of the Government to interfere with him; but this was not a question of that description; and at all events the matter was one in which an explanation was most assuredly due to the House. Seeing that the Bill as it now stood was one of little value, while it was calculated to create the greatest possible embarrassment at elections, he trusted that it would be allowed to remain over till next Session, when it might be made really effective for the suppression of bribery and corruption.

SIR CHARLES BURRELL said, he thought candidates should be allowed to pay the travelling expenses of poor voters, who had not the means of going to the poll at their own cost. He would also suggest that more polling-booths should be erected in large counties, and in any future Bill he hoped that point would not be lost sight of. The omission of the clause which allowed travelling expenses was a harsh and injudicious act, and he would therefore vote against it.

LORD ROBERT GROSVENOR said, he must deny the assertion of the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford (Mr. Malins), that the Government had to a man supported the clause in that House. The Attorney General not only voted, but spoke, against the clause. He rejoiced exceedingly at the course which had been taken in the other House, for he saw an opening for incalculable mischief in the Bill as it left the House of Commons. So great, indeed, had been his objection to the clause, that he had felt it his duty to vote against the passing of the Bill. Hon. Gentlemen opposite seemed to take a very extraordinary view of the duties of a candidate. Formerly, if a man went down to a borough and openly stated his intention—and kept to it—not to pay more than legal expenses, he was held up to honour; but now there seemed to be an idea abroad that a great portion of the expenses, properly belonging to the borough, ought to be got out of the candidate.

The House divided:—Ayes 78; Noes 21: Majority 57.

Main Question again proposed.

LORD HOTHAM said, in pursuance of the feeling he had on this subject, it was now his duty to move that the House do now adjourn. In doing so, he would take the liberty of saying one or two words in reference to what had fallen from the noble Lord the President of the Council, who appeared to be under the impression that he (Lord Hotham) had stated that this clause involved the principle of the Bill. He neither said so, nor did he feel it to be any such thing. But what he did say was, that there was no clause in the Bill on which the House had expressed a more decided opinion, or on which more divisions had been taken. It was on that ground that he considered the House ought not to assent to the omission of the clause. He had no other object in view than that this clause should remain in the Bill, although it had been said that a question was sought to be raised as to whether the Bill should be proceeded with or not. For his own part, he would scorn taking the opportunity of doing indirectly what he could not do directly. His objection was solely to the omission of this clause. The noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) was to decide whether the Bill should pass or not. It was not a question between the House of Commons and the House of Lords, but a question between the Ministers of the Crown in that House and the Ministers of the Crown in the other House of Parliament. If the noble Lord was willing to determine that the repeated decisions of the House of Commons should be maintained and that the clause should be restored, then he (Lord Hotham) should not offer one further word of objection to the Bill.

Mr. HILDYARD said, he wished to correct a great misrepresentation of the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Hume), that he had said the House of Lords had acted capriciously. What he said was that if the House of Lords thought proper to reject this Bill because the House of Commons adhered to a clause upon which they had five times divided, and which they had carried by large majorities, they would, in so rejecting it, act capriciously, and on them would be the consequence of that rejection. To every word of that statement he adhered. By majorities of nearly three to one that House had declared that reasonable and actual expenses of travelling were not illegal. The clause was not an enacting, but a declaratory clause, that the payment of the reasonable and actual expenses of voters was not illegal. The House of Lords had struck out that clause, without declaring that the payment of those expenses was illegal.

What, then, would be the condition of county Members? They would not be able to pay a single farthing on account of such expenses without risking the loss of their seats.

The House divided:—Ayes 16; Noes 84: Majority 68.

Main Question again proposed.

Mr. FITZWILLIAM HUME moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. HUME said, he trusted, after the manifestation of the opinion of the House, that the further opposition to this Bill would be withdrawn.

Mr. HILDYARD said, he was astonished the hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose should talk of the manifestation of a majority in that House, when it was well known the present manifestation was the manifestation of a minority, against which there had been a vote of at least three to one of that House. The noble Lord the President of the Council had now all his supporters still in town, but the great bulk of the Members who would support the noble Lord (Lord Hotham) had left town.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he did not think the hon. and learned Member who had just sat down was remarkable for his calmness. It could not well be said of the hon. and learned Gentleman—

"Whose own example strengthens all his laws,
And is himself the great sublime he draws."

The hon. and learned Gentleman was mistaken in supposing this clause formed any part of the original Bill. The clause in question had been added to it at a later period of the discussion, and it never formed a portion of the original Bill. He trusted the noble Lord would not now put the House to the trouble of dividing, but would take the sense of it on the main question, that they agree or disagree to the Lords' Amendments. The noble Lord must perceive, that in the division which had taken place, not merely the ordinary supporters of the Government voted in favour of the Lords' Amendments, but also many of those who sat upon the noble Lord's own side of the House.

COLONEL BLAIR said, he would remind the noble Lord that, not many weeks ago, he had stated that, if he conscientiously believed he were right, however small the minority who supported him, he would persevere. He also begged to remind the noble Lord that a great many Members who had formerly opposed the view taken by the House of Lords, were now out of town, and had not had notice that the question was to be discussed.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that the occasion to which the hon. and gallant Member adverted, upon which he (Lord J. Russell) spoke as stated, was where a minority attempted to contravene the wishes of the majority.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he had taken a deep interest in this Bill from the commencement. It was not special or partial legislation, but applied equally to England, Ireland, and Scotland, and he trusted the noble Lord (Lord Hotham) would not again uselessly divide the House.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he would advise the hon. Member for Wicklow (Mr. F. Hume) not to press his Amendment to a division, but that he and his friends should reserve their forces for his (Mr. Duncombe's) Amendment, that the operation of the Bill be limited to twelve months.

MR. MALINS said, he must complain that no notice had been given of agreement to these Amendments being moved. There were many at this moment within two miles of the House of Commons who did not know what was going on, and who had no reason to know what was going on. He justified the course which he and his friends were taking, and which he admitted upon ordinary occasions was exceedingly to be deprecated, upon the ground that they were asked to reverse the oft-repeated decision of that House, and to do it without reasonable notice.

MR. BENTINCK said, he had not been in the House upon the two former divisions, but should vote for the present Amendment, if it were pressed, upon the ground that it was a most unjustifiable proceeding to attempt, at that period of the Session, and in such a House as was then assembled, to force on a measure of this kind without proper notice. It was a positive act of deception on the House. A measure of this magnitude, and involving such great interests, ought to have been brought forward and discussed at such a period of the Session as would have ensured a proper attendance of Members.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

The House divided:—Ayes 15; Noes 81: Majority 66.

Main Question again proposed.

Motion made, and Question put, "That this House do now adjourn."

Colonel Blair

The House divided:—Ayes 13; Noes 79: Majority 66.

Main Question again proposed.

MR. MALINS said, he thought the noble Lord the President of the Council would agree with him, that it was not fair that such a subject should be discussed without notice. In order, therefore, that such notice might be given, and that those hon. Members who were absent might have an opportunity of attending, he would propose an adjournment until Thursday. He would have preferred Friday, but he understood that the prorogation was to be on Saturday, and he could see that Friday might be inconvenient; but he trusted that the noble Lord would think that, in proposing Thursday, he was only suggesting a fair compromise. There was another reason for the postponement. It would afford the noble Lord an opportunity of giving an answer to the question he had asked just now, and which, he thought, respect for the country and that House demanded should be answered, as to the reasons which had led the noble Duke (his colleague) to move in the other House of Parliament to undo that which the noble Lord in that House had himself proposed to do.

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. and learned Gentleman could only move that the debate be adjourned.

MR. MALINS said, he would therefore alter his Amendment accordingly, on the understanding that, if carried, the discussion should be resumed on Thursday.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, a postponement to Thursday would give hon. Gentlemen opposite a great advantage. It was obvious that they might pursue the same course on that day and on Friday as they had pursued to-day, and then the only alternative would be, that the prorogation must be postponed or the Bill be lost.

MR. BRIGHT said, it appeared to him there was something not quite so honest as they might expect in the course which hon. Gentlemen opposite were taking. They were objecting now to the further progress of the Bill, on the ground that a particular clause had been withdrawn, but they had voted against the Bill with that clause in it; and the ground of their opposition, therefore, must be sought, not in the withdrawal of the clause, but in the ancient inveterate hostility to the Bill itself. He thought that the objection as to want of notice savoured very much of a court of law; that those hon. Members who were still in town, and had sufficient means of knowing that the subject was to be discussed, and that those who had gone out of town, must be supposed to have ascertained before they left, whether there was any business which remained to be transacted of sufficient importance to detain them. The hon. and learned Member for Wallingford (Mr. Malins) claimed to represent a majority of the House. How did he know that? The noble Lord the President of the Council, on whose recommendation only the House had agreed to this clause, had changed his opinion upon it; and they all knew that the noble Lord's conversion was generally followed by the conversion of a great many others. He remembered to have heard it said of a certain Cardinal that he had baptized 4,000 or 5,000 people at once by the twirling of a mop; and when the noble Lord changed his opinions a great many other people changed their opinions at the same time. He would put it to the noble Lord whether it was worth his while—as this was a temporary measure—as a majority of the House of Commons had adopted it—as the House of Lords had thought it of sufficient importance to warrant a suspension in its favour of the Resolution it had passed this Session—as the whole subject must be reconsidered at all events within the next two years—it was worth his while to persevere in a course which, supported by thirteen Members—just “a baker's dozen”—against seventy-nine, could lead to no practical result?

MR. HILDYARD said, he must still contend that the objection made upon the ground of want of notice was the objection, not merely of a lawyer, but of a statesman, and he assuredly should support the course which the Opposition had pursued.

MR. BENTINCK said, he maintained that it was perfectly consistent with the opposition that had been given to a Bill which they believed to be bad, mischievous, and inefficient, to support the reintroduction of a clause, the omission of which, they considered, made a bad measure worse.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he agreed that the clause which the Lords had struck out was one of great importance, for, if it had become law, rank bribery would for the first time have become legalised. What hon. Gentlemen wished, therefore, was to establish bribery by Act of Parliament.

LORD HOTHAM said, if, as the hon. Gentleman had stated, the clause in question would have sanctioned bribery, how happened it that he himself, on four or five different occasions, voted for it? The hon. Gentleman had, as he had frequently done before, imputed motives to those who were opposed to him. How much better it would be if the hon. Gentleman would confine himself to giving his reasons for the opinions he entertained. As to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright), he would only say, that it was not the fact that those who sought to maintain the clause which the Lords had struck out wished to establish bribery. [MR. BRIGHT: Hear, hear.] At all events, the hon. Gentleman imputed to the minority that they had an object other than that which they professed. He (Lord Hotham) could only say that, whatever might be the merits of the clause, it was one which had over and over again been confirmed by that House. It was on that ground, without any reference to the intrinsic merits of the clause itself, that he was proceeding on this occasion. The ground he was now going upon was, that there was originally a large majority extremely in favour of the clause. Nothing would have induced him to put himself in the situation he was then assuming, but a most sacred sense of duty. It was a position which was most distasteful to him, but from which he felt he could not recede without sacrificing his conscientious feelings, and consenting to a most unworthy surrender of the privileges of that House.

Motion made, and Question put, “That the Debate be now adjourned.”

The House divided:—Ayes 13; Noes 78: Majority 65.

Main Question again proposed.

LORD HOTHAM: I move that the House do now adjourn.

MR. MALINS said, he had hoped, when he moved that the debate be adjourned to Thursday next, that the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) would have acceded to so reasonable a proposition, but, as the noble Lord had not thought proper to do so, he did not think it was necessary to proceed further in dividing the House.

Motion made, and Question put, “That this House do now adjourn.”

The House divided:—Ayes 11; Noes 77: Majority 66.

Main Question again proposed.

LORD HOTHAM said, he should again move that the debate be adjourned.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE: Mr. Speaker, it appears that both sides of the House are gradually dwindling away, and as the minority are decreasing two to one, as compared with the majority, it is clear that in the end they must give way. Now, I would suggest that time would be saved, and the object of both parties attained, by the adoption of the compromise I suggested an hour or two ago, that the present Bill should continue in operation for twelvemonths and the then next Session of Parliament instead of for two years, and the then next Session. This, I conceive, would meet the views of both parties. The noble Lord the President of the Council would then no doubt undertake to bring in a new Bill in the course of next year, but if the operation of the Bill be extended for three years after what has taken place this evening, I think it very probable that we shall not have an effectual Bribery Bill for a considerable length of time. I hope the noble Lord the Lord President will consent to this arrangement, and that the noble Lord opposite (Lord Hotham) will also acquiesce in it.

LORD HOTHAM said, he had no other object in view than an imperative sense of public duty. He was ready to admit that if the operation of the Bill were limited to twelve months, the view he entertained of the matter would be considerably modified, and if the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) consented to provide that it should continue only for one year, he (Lord Hotham), being most unwilling to interfere more than was absolutely necessary with the progress of other business, would readily acquiesce in that arrangement.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: If my hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury means to propose that the Bill shall continue for one year, and to the end of the then next Session of Parliament, I shall be willing to accede to that proposal. There would then be time to consider any other Bill which it might be thought desirable to introduce, but if it was limited to one year only, an attempt might be made on the first or second reading or on some other stage of such Bill, to move adjournment after adjournment, and thus prevent the passing of any measure upon the subject.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he believed that the words "and to the end of the then next Session of Parliament," were generally introduced into Bills not to be in force, but to cover any accident that might occur such as the noble Lord had suggested, and his object was not to run the present Bill until the end of the next Session, after the expiration of the year, but to afford the noble Lord the opportunity of bringing in another Bill next Session, and doing his best to carry it, but having the prospect of the continuance of the present Bill until the end of the succeeding Session should he fail in doing so.

LORD HOTHAM said, he was willing to acquiesce in the proposed arrangement.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Of course I shall feel myself at perfect liberty to propose either to amend this Bill in another Session, or to reintroduce it exactly as it is if I should so think fit. By acquiescing in this arrangement, I must not be understood as binding myself to any particular course in this respect.

MR. MALINS said, he hoped the noble Lord, whether he introduced this Bill or proposed a new one, would incorporate in it the clause which had been struck out by the Lords.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL then moved an Amendment in accordance with Mr. T. Duncombe's suggestion, limiting the duration of the Bill to one year, and to the end of the then next Session of Parliament.

In reply to Mr. HILDYARD,

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, of course this Amendment would have to go up to the Lords for their concurrence.

Amendment agreed to.

COMMON LAW PROCEDURE BILL.

Order for Third Reading read.

MR. I. BUTT said, he did not wish to oppose this Bill, but he would make an appeal to the Government to expunge the 13th clause, which would disturb the old established law of the country as to the unanimity of juries. He might be allowed to remind the House that the clause embodying a most important alteration in the law was carried in opposition to the opinion of the Attorney General for England, the Solicitor General for Ireland, as well as in opposition to the opinion of the Commissioners, in accordance with whose views the rest of the Bill was framed—namely, the Common Law Commissioners, who distinctly declared that unanimity on the part of juries ought not to be dispensed with. And to this he might add that the opinion of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Recorder of London (Mr. S. Wortley) was decidedly to the same effect; while he had learned from a private conversation with the hon. and learned Attorney General that he remained of the same opinion which he had originally expressed, and that he certainly did not think so important a change ought to be made without the completest discussion. What he felt bound, therefore, to ask the Government was, that at so late a period of the Session, and in the face of an understanding that the discussion as to the merits of this clause was to be postponed until the third reading, they would not press the measure this Session. For, he must say, if they were to carry it through in a House so thinly attended as the present, the public would not fail to conclude that so important a change had been made without that deliberative solemnity and discussion so eminently to be desired. And he might here observe that the clause was not at all essential to the Bill; in fact, one of his arguments against the clause was, that it did not at all properly belong to it, for it was a Bill regulating the practice and procedure of the common law courts. Now, a measure of that kind was hardly one in which provisions dealing with an institution so essential to the working of English society as trial by jury could be introduced. For himself, he believed if the clause were accepted it would lead to the abolition of trial by jury altogether; but, at all events, whether the changes it proposed were right or wrong, he felt sure all would agree that it ought not to be passed except in a full House. He thought, then, that the most equitable course to take would be to expunge the clause altogether from the Bill—or, at least, that part of it which went to establish the verdict of ten jurymen as admissible; and if it was judged advisable to introduce so important a change as that, let it be done by a distinct and separate measure next Session. If that were done he was free to acknowledge that this Common Law Procedure Act would be a very valuable improvement upon the law as it now stood, and on that account there was the more reason for regretting that the Bill had been embarrassed with such extraneous matter. There was also a few other clauses in the Bill altering the law of evidence generally, to which he was disposed to take objection. Hitherto the law of evidence had been the same in England and Ireland. Now, he thought it would be introducing a very dangerous principle, and it would lead to confusion, if they sanctioned a difference in the practice of the courts of England and Ireland on the subject of evidence. Still, he was not disposed, as he had previously stated, to oppose the further progress of the Bill on that ground, should he obtain an assurance that the Government would not press the 13th clause.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he readily admitted that the opinions of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General and of the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Keogh) were not favourable to that portion of the 13th clause which authorised the reception of the verdict of ten jurymen in lieu of an unanimous decision. On the other hand, the Bill came down to them sanctioned by the high authority of the House of Lords. On the whole, however, he would recommend the House not to insist upon that part of the clause objected to by the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Butt), but to defer the introduction of the principle it embodied to a future Session. With regard to the other objection of the hon. and learned Member, namely, that there ought to be one rule as to evidence for both countries, he thought there could be but one opinion on that subject, and therefore he would at once undertake that all the clauses having reference to that subject should be made applicable to Ireland as well as to England.

MR. J. G. PHILLIMORE said, he hoped the House would on no account accede to the suggestion thrown out by the hon. and learned Solicitor General. The principle of unanimity on the part of a jury was founded upon the most flagrant absurdity, and he would tell the hon. and learned Member for Youghal (Mr. Butt) that, though the Bill had been framed in defiance of the opinions of the hon. and learned Attorney General and the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, there were authorities at least equal to theirs in favour of the principle of the clause. His own opinion was, that the verdict of nine jurymen given in after a lapse of twelve hours, backed by the authority of the Judge who tried the cause, ought to be conclusive, and was at least equal to the unanimous verdict of twelve jurymen. At all events, that was the recommendation of the Common Law Commission. He, for one, would not consent to this clause being struck out of the Bill; and he trusted that his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General would never be induced to consent to abandon a provision of so beneficial a nature, and which would tend to rescue the law of trial by jury from a charge of the grossest absurdity.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he thought the argument of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. J. G. Phillimore) went much beyond what he intended; for his argument went to this, that every jurymen should be allowed to vote exactly as he pleased, and that then the verdict should be taken according to the opinions of the majority. By limiting the number assenting to a verdict to nine, in place of twelve, they did not get rid at all of the question of principle. Now, the course which his hon. and learned Friend had proposed did not decide the question; because, by disagreeing to this portion of the Bill, a discussion between the two Houses would be involved, and thus the matter at issue would remain open. He, therefore, thought that upon a question of such very great importance, and in reference to which such a variety of opinions prevailed on both sides of the House, it would be far better to leave the law as it stood during the few months intervening between this and the next Session of Parliament, than act in a headlong manner in regard to the extensive change proposed by the Bill. He would, therefore, suggest to his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. J. G. Phillimore) to waive his objections, and next Session a Bill might be brought in dealing specifically with the subject.

MR. MALINS said, he highly approved of the course proposed by the hon. and learned Solicitor General. He perfectly coincided in the opinion that the clause contemplated one of the greatest alterations that could possibly take place in the administration of justice in this country. He thought that, so far as that House was concerned, the greatest caution and consideration were necessary, and that the provisions of the clause eminently merited being dealt with in a separate enactment.

MR. HUME said, he had always thought it absurd to compel unanimity on the part of twelve jurymen. That was a conclusion in direct accordance with the dictates of common sense, and did not require many hours' discussion, either in the morning or the evening, to be arrived at. He, therefore, thought the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. J. G. Phillimore) was perfectly justified in urging the necessity of this change; at the same time, he would recommend him not to press his objection at present, lest it might endanger a measure in other respects also so beneficial.

MR. J. G. PHILLIMORE said, he would consent to allow the particular provision to be expunged from the clause, lest, by his opposition, the passing a measure otherwise of so excellent a character should be endangered.

Bill read 3^d, and passed.

EAST INDIA COMPANY'S REVENUE ACCOUNTS.

House in Committee.

SIR CHARLES WOOD: Sir, I rise now in order to perform the promise I made last year to this House, that, if I occupied the position which I have the honour to hold as President of the Board of Control, I would submit a statement to Parliament respecting the finances of India, and, at the same time, would give a general explanation of the progress of India since the subject was last under discussion in this House. In order to enable me so to do, I propose to follow the precedent set in former years—though it is now only two years short of half a century since an Indian budget was last presented to the House of Commons—and to move certain Resolutions on the subject of the finances of India. Those who have referred to what took place on former occasions will be aware that many of the Resolutions then moved (though some relating to the commercial receipts of the India Company and to their transactions as manufacturers would be inapplicable to the altered state of circumstances) referred to the income, expenditure, and surplus of the Indian revenue, and they will be Resolutions similar to those which, before I sit down, I shall have the honour of proposing. The Resolutions referred first to the revenue and expenditure of the several presidencies, next to the revenue of India generally, and lastly, to the ultimate surplus, after defraying the whole of the charges payable out of the Indian revenues. The Resolutions which I shall submit are in truth, as on former occasions, nothing more than assertions of matters of fact, deducible from the accounts laid on the table of the House, whether those prepared in the old fashion, according to Acts of Parliament, or those framed in a different manner, which I moved for in the course of the Session, and which are now in the hands of hon. Members. The principal advantage, of course, which I anticipate from the present discussion, is not so much the eliciting the opinions of the House on the finances of India, as that it will enable Government to lay before the House a general view of the state of the Indian empire, and also afford an opportunity to hon. Gentlemen to make such observations as they think fit on the subject, or to seek for further information connected with that most important part of the British dominions, which, so far as I am able to give it from any documents in my possession, I shall be anxious to afford. I do not know that I need say much more on the general character of the Resolutions, but before I go further into the statement, I wish to say a word or two respecting the form of the Indian accounts in the hands of Members. Under Act of Parliament, accounts made up in a particular manner are annually laid on the table of the House. I did not think, when I had time to turn my attention to these matters, that the accounts presented in that shape afforded as much information as it was desirable should be laid before Parliament, and accordingly I desired accounts to be framed very much on the model of the finance accounts of this country, giving very full information on the subjects of the Indian revenue, income, and expenditure. These accounts hon. Gentlemen have had now in their hands for some time, and will be therefore able to express an opinion with respect to them. They were framed with very great care by a gentleman attached to the India Company's establishment in the City, and were submitted to another gentleman of the highest character in our financial department, the chief clerk of the revenue room in the Treasury. They afterwards underwent careful revision by myself, and I think they may be considered satisfactory as regards their form, and the character of the information they give. I am quite aware that they exhibit some defects, which I hope to remedy before presenting them to the House in another year, but for a first attempt to give full information to the House, I trust they will be regarded as a very great improvement on the present form of account. I also take this opportunity of saying that I was anxious to present at the same time to the House accounts similar to the trade and navigation accounts of this country; but I found that, in consequence of the accounts of the different presidencies not being kept in the same form, or not being brought up to the same time, it would be difficult in this year to produce complete accounts of this description. Instructions were sent out in the course of last autumn to the different presidencies, desiring that the accounts might be framed upon a new model, and I hope next year to be able to lay on the table Indian accounts corresponding with the trade and navigation accounts of the United Kingdom. I will only make one further preliminary observation with respect to the time to which these accounts are brought up. It is with very great regret that I am unable to lay before the House accounts—that is to say, complete accounts—up to a period later than the 30th of April, 1852. Those which have been laid on the table of the House pursuant to Act of Parliament, framed on the old model, I believe it would be easy to present at an earlier period. But I have been unwilling to make any change in this respect, because, though I might get the accounts presented two or three months sooner, I should not be satisfied, considering the accelerated means of communication with India, until I gained a whole year, and produced in the month of May or June complete accounts up to the end of the previous year. Instructions have been sent to the Governments of the different presidencies to expedite the transmission of the accounts as much as possible; and I hope, before a couple of years elapse, that I shall be able to effect the result I have stated. The general purport of the Resolutions which I shall move—following former precedents—will set forth the income and charge of each presidency, the income and charge of India payable in India, and the difference between the income and the charges. At the same time, it is true that the accounts will not give an exact representation of the charges of the separate presidencies, because there are some general charges included in the revenues of each presidency, and some, which ought to be divided among the several presidencies are charged to one. Thus, the charges of the Government of India are defrayed out of the revenues of Bengal; the charges of batta are paid out of the revenues of Madras, and of the Indian navy by Bombay, though these charges ought fairly to be distributed between the different presidencies. In like manner, the retired pay and furlough allowance for the whole of India are put into one general sum, though a portion belongs to each of the presidencies. I mention this circumstance to show that in the statement we are able to make out we do not accurately get the separate charges of the respective presidencies, nor the general charges of the Indian Government as distinguished from the local payments. Whether in another year it would be desirable to continue the accounts in this form is a subject for consideration, but at present I will only repeat that this is a first attempt to give information as fully as possible with respect to Indian finance. The information furnished in the statement I am about to make is principally derived from the Parliamentary papers on the subject under the heads in those papers, Nos. 12, 13, and 29. The first Resolution states the amount of the revenue of the Presidency of Bengal, including some districts attached to it, and the local charges thereon, exclusive of the military charge.

I am obliged to make that distinction, for, with respect to the army of Bengal, a portion is the army of the North-Western Provinces as well as of Bengal. Therefore, when I state the revenue of Bengal, with the local charges thereon, I shall exclude the army and I shall make the same deduction for the purpose of fair comparison in respect to the North-Western Provinces, and shall afterwards add the army common to both districts. The first resolution I shall move will state that the revenue of Bengal, on the 30th of April, 1852, was 7,584,435*l*. [The right hon. Gentleman here read the following statement, embodying the information contained in the Resolutions he intended to move—]

I. BENGAL :
Revenue	£7,584,435
Local Charges.....	1,936,362
Local Surplus.....	£5,648,073

Local Charges.....	1,402,238
Local Surplus.....	4,268,477
Military Charges of Bengal and North-Western Provinces.....	5,442,230
Net Revenue of ditto	£13,355,150
Charges of ditto.....	8,770,330
Surplus available for General Purposes of India.....	£4,484,820
II. MADRAS :
Revenue	3,704,048
Charges	3,204,273
Surplus available for General Purposes of India.....	499,775
III. BOMBAY :
Revenue	2,868,298
Charges	2,847,392
Surplus available for General Purposes of India.....	20,906
Total Revenues of the several Presidencies	19,827,498
Total Charges of ditto	14,822,495
Total Surplus of ditto	5,005,001
Interest on Indian Debt	1,987,359
Charges defrayed in England	2,506,377
Total Charges on Indian Revenues	4,473,736
Surplus of Income over Expenditure	£531,265

That statement, I am happy to say, is a satisfactory statement, and for the two years preceding 1851-52 there was also a surplus, though not so large. In 1849-50 the surplus was 354,337*l.*, and in 1850-51 415,866*l.* I have already stated that the year 1851-52 is the last year for which I have a complete statement, but I have an approximate one for the year 1852-53, and I think it desirable to put the House in possession of the most recent information in my power to furnish, though I cannot state anything not resting on certain and positive information. The statement of the gross account for 1852-53, and 1853-54, is as follows:—1852-53, income, 26,915,431*l.*; expenditure, 26,275,966*l.*; surplus, 639,465*l.*; 1853-54, income, 26,586,826*l.*; expenditure, 27,459,161*l.*; deficit, 872,335*l.* I confess it is with very great sorrow that I have to make this last statement, especially as the circumstances of the preceding year encouraged the expectation of a different result. But, taking the last three years together, there is a surplus of income over expenditure. When there is a great variation in different years, and the balances sometimes stand over, so that the expenditure of each year does not accurately represent the charge of the year, it is fair, I think, to take the average income and expenditure of two or three years. On the whole, therefore, I by no means despair of future years, although, when there is so large a deficit staring us in the face, it might appear at first sight to be somewhat disheartening, and it renders it necessary to postpone some changes in the taxation of India, which I am anxious to see effected. Hon. Members must remember that the revenue of India is not like the revenue of this country, in which a reduction of one item leads perhaps to an increase in another. In the great item of the land revenue, which furnishes by far the largest portion of the revenue of India, there can be no increase. With regard to Bengal, the terms of the settlement preclude any possibility of increase from that source. In the North-Western Provinces, where the leases are granted for a long term of years, and in Bombay, where the land is also leased for terms of years, there cannot, at any rate until the expiration of those leases, be any increase of revenue from that source. With regard to Madras, I am afraid, so far as the land revenue goes, that, whatever may ultimately be the case, the first operation will result in a reduction. I will not raise again the question which was discussed some nights ago as to the tenure of land in Madras. It is substantially a tenure subject to a very heavy quit-rent; and though a most able officer, Colonel Cotton, who is acquainted with public works there, states that it would be easier to raise the land to the value of the assessment than to reduce the assessment to the rent which might be fairly paid, there can be little doubt that the assessments in this portion of the presidency ought to be reduced. I am inclined to think that, in the end, the effect of reducing the assessments would be to bring a greater amount of land into cultivation, and ultimately perhaps to bring up the land revenue of Madras to a considerable extent; yet, in the first instance, a reduction would inevitably follow the first alteration of assessment. At present, all that it is necessary to say is, that it is impossible to expect any addition to the land revenue of Madras; and that, taking the land revenue of India over all the presidencies, no increase can be expected from that source for some time to come. The next item of revenue in India is opium, which amounts sometimes to 4,000,000*l.*, and is sometimes much lower. There is an estimated deficit for this year; but as I am of opinion, whether the rebels or the supporters of the present dynasty in China ultimately have possession of that country, that the use of opium will not diminish, and as I believe that the Indian opium is of a very excellent quality, better than any produced in China, I think it likely that the demand for opium from that country will not materially diminish, and that the revenue may by possibility be maintained. Still it is one of a most uncertain character, and we should be building our calculations upon a most unsubstantial foundation if we based them upon any anticipated permanent increase from that source. The next great item of revenue is salt. I cannot forget that in the last Session of Parliament the House of Commons came to a vote—an ill-advised one, as I think—upon the subject of salt. The subject of the salt duty in India could not properly or fairly be dealt with in the state of feeling which was engendered in this country with regard to it some years ago, when it was one only of many objectionable taxes paid by the people. It was quite right to abolish it here. But in India the people have long been accustomed to it—as nearly the only tax on any articles of their consumption. You can hardly deny that it is reasonable and fair that the mass of the people of India should in some way contribute to the revenue of the country. This is almost the only tax which they pay. It is one to which they have been accustomed, and it is one which does not in any way whatever press heavily upon those who are subjected to it. Since that debate took place a most interesting document has been placed in my hand—a statistical paper which has been prepared by a medical man at Calcutta, and which was printed, I believe, in some of the Calcutta journals. He took very great pains in inquiring from persons who came under his charge into the condition of the peasantry of that part of the country; and it may be satisfactory to the Committee that I should read the conclusions which he arrives at from his investigations. He goes at great detail into the quantity of food which they are able to consume, and he compares it with the most authentic information which he can obtain from all parts of the civilised world, including Europe, Asia, and America. Giving in a detailed shape the amounts obtained, he thus sums up the conclusions at which he arrives—

“Sufficiency of food and income in excess of necessary expenditure constitute two important elements of the public weal, and these would certainly appear to have been in existence in the portion of Bengal from which my observations are derived. That many and various social evils yet exist cannot be doubted; but want of means to procure a sufficiency of food for the retention of life and health would not appear to be one of them, except in special famine years, and so far Bengal may be considered to exhibit as small an average deficiency of the comforts of life as any modern nation.”

That is, I think, a satisfactory account of the general state of the peasantry in that part of the Indian empire. With regard, however, to the particular point, of the sufficiency of the supply of salt—that was the subject of his closest investigation, and he gives the result of inquiries which he made from 100 patients taken indifferently in the hospital, whom he questioned upon that subject. Ninety-eight out of 100 stated that the supply of salt was ample for all their purposes, and two only stated that it was insufficient. I think that that is answer enough to the statement which was pretty generally made, that the people in that country suffered grievously from the inadequate supply of salt, produced, as it was said, by the monopoly of the East India Company. Monopoly it most undoubtedly is not—but I will only state, upon this branch of the case, with regard to the mode of collection, which was the subject of the vote last year, that a Commission was appointed by the Governor General to inquire into the subject, and that Mr. Plowden, a very able civil officer, was desired to investigate it. He has visited Bombay and Madras for that purpose, and, when the result of his inquiry shall be sent home from the Governor General, I shall have great pleasure in laying it upon the table of the House. But the Committee must be aware what a great objection there is to the introduction of a system of Excise into India—an objection in which I shall be supported by my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle, who stated that nothing could be more cruel and oppressive than the mode in which the Native collectors of the revenue discharged their functions. If you do establish an Excise, however, you must, for the protection of the revenue, increase the number of Native officers, and, with the number, increase their means of extortion and oppression. With regard to the only other item from which any considerable amount is produced namely, the Customs revenue, which produces, exclusively of salt, about 1,000,000*l.* a year—I fear that until the exports from India can be materially increased we cannot expect any great augmentation from that source. There has been a gradual increase of late years, and I hope that the exports from that country will increase. My hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Mr. Gregson) certainly leads me to hope that there may be in the present demand for fibrous substances some increase in the export of those articles from India. They do exist there in great quantities, and but a very insufficient proportion is brought to this country. I am aware the chairman of the Liverpool East Indian Association does not entertain any very lively expectation of a large amount being brought from that country; but the hon. Member for Lancaster knows the country, and I hope that he is right in his expectations. My own attention was attracted to the fact that large quantities of flax are absolutely burnt in Scinde, the only value which is attached to it being on account of the oil which is contained in the seed. I have desired the Governor of Bombay to ascertain if more of this flax could be sent to England, and I have requested the Governor General to consider the whole subject of the fibrous substances produced on the shores of the Bay of Bengal, and to send over any reasonable quantities of articles of that description which may be fairly submitted to the manufacturers of this country; because it is impossible that there can be any supply of hemp or flax or fibrous substances produced in any quantity of which our manufacturers would not be able to avail themselves. This being the case, I am afraid that there is no prospect—certainly no positive prospect—of an increased revenue in India, while in most of the items of expenditure I fear that there is no prospect of any material diminution. The large item of expenditure in India is, as I said before, the army, and we have already undertaken the defence and the maintenance of the peace of a very large additional territory, without any material addition to the army. The whole of the territory of the Punjab, besides the territories of Nagpoor and Pegu, have been occupied, and the only addition which has been made in respect of the army has been two European regiments and the three not yet formed which were authorised by Parliament last year. With so much additional territory, it could hardly be supposed that an increased military force would not be requisite, and I fear, therefore, that we can hardly expect any great diminution in the expenses under that head. If you will refer to the statistical papers which were laid upon the table of the House last year, you will see how remarkably small is the number of troops by means of which our empire there has been maintained, especially when compared with the number of troops still supported by the Native States in India. Taking, in round numbers, the whole Queen's troops at 30,000, and the Europeans in the Company's service, including officers of Native regiments, at 20,000, we have a total of 50,000 Europeans. In addition to these there are 240,000 Natives, giving a total for Company's and Queen's army of 290,000. Beyond these, again, there are 30,000 contingents commanded by English, making altogether 320,000 men; while the few Native States that are left in India actually maintain for one description of force or another no less than 398,000 men. I do not think that we are justified, therefore, in anticipating any material diminution in that respect. When the means of communication shall be improved, and the power of moving troops from one part of the empire to another shall be facilitated, no doubt some reduction may be made;

Sir C. Wood

but, until that period arrives, it is not probable nor reasonable, with a great additional territory to be defended, that there can be any sensible reduction in the army expenses of India. With regard to other sources of expense I will, at present, only refer to two—first, public works; secondly, judicial establishments. I think the general feeling in the House last year, produced by the result of the examination before the Select Committee, was, that this expenditure under those two heads should be increased, and not diminished. Since that time I have derived much pleasure, as well as instruction, from the perusal of two very able publications connected with India; one by Colonel Cotton, upon the subject of public works, and the other by Mr. Norton, upon the subject of judicial establishments. Both writers, although they are not attached in any way to the Indian Government, distinctly point out the inadequacy of European agency, as they call it, with reference to the public works and the judicial establishments of India, and state that it is utterly impossible that either can be conducted properly without some increase in the number of Europeans employed in those departments. Now, I do not mean to say that we should take the opinions of those two gentlemen for more than they are worth; but, at all events, they show, I think, the necessity which exists for an increased European agency, if we expect the public works and the judicial establishments to be properly conducted, and their expenditure carefully watched. I have since talked the matter over with Colonel Cotton, and he is strongly of opinion that, unless we do send out European superintendents, we shall be throwing a great deal of money absolutely away. There is another source of expenditure which I may mention, namely, that upon education, and I refer to it only to say that I am quite sure nobody will grudge the sum to be expended under that head. I have now mentioned three great sources of expenditure in which it is clear an increase, and not a diminution, must take place, and upon those great main heads of expenditure, therefore, reduction is pretty nearly out of the question. There is, however, one considerable source of expenditure upon which I am happy to say we have been able to effect a considerable reduction. I refer to the interest paid on the Indian debt. Nothing has given me greater satisfaction than to have been able to complete—for although the transaction has not been altogether brought to a close, it has substantially been, to all intents and purposes, completed—the conversion of the India 5 per cents, which are now altogether reduced to a maximum interest of 4 per cent, with the exception of some old bonds payable at a certain time, and with the exception of a small portion of the 5 per cents, which have been paid in cash. I will state to the House what the result of that operation has been. A similar operation, but to a much smaller extent, took place in 1847, and on my accession to the office which I have now the honour to hold, I sent out directions to the Governor General to proceed at once to reduce the whole of the 5 per cents. He proceeded to do so with great discretion and judgment, and the following was the result of the operation up to the end of May last. The first debt operated upon was that of the transfer loan (England) for 3,441,000*l*. Of that sum there has been transferred to the 4 per cents, 2,734,000*l*.; taken in cash, 707,000*l*. The whole amount of the general debt at 5 per cent, which was next to be operated upon, was 23,771,000*l*. Of that sum 20,701,000*l*. have been transferred, 1,370,000*l*. have been taken in cash, and 1,700,000*l*. remained at that time untouched. The demand for cash very considerably increased when the funds of this country fell; and the operation of the war naturally produced an effect in India, so that those who would have converted their 5 per cents into 4 per cents demanded immediate payment in cash. But, prior to the despatch of the last accounts, the market here had turned, and therefore I think in all probability the demands for cash, after the arrival of those accounts, would not be in greater proportion to the conversions than they had been in the month preceding the departure of the latest advices from India. In estimating, therefore, what may be done with the 1,700,000*l*. which remained unaccounted for in May last, I will presume that they will be transferred or taken in cash in the same proportions as the transactions of the preceding month. If that be so, then 1,200,000*l*. will be transferred, and 500,000*l*. will be taken in cash. Of the whole 5 per cents, therefore—23,771,000*l*.—21,901,000*l*. will be transferred, and 1,870,000*l*. taken in cash. But I do not think that even that gives a fair representation of the result of this operation. It is the practice in India to have what is called an open loan; that is to say, any person who at any time pays money to the Government receives a certain amount of interest. Now, it so happened that at the time this conversion scheme was commenced, there was an open 4 per cent loan, which was closed in the month of September last, a new 3½ per cent loan having been opened since that date. Since the period of the conversions there have been paid into the 4 per cent and 3½ per cent loans, independently of the sums which have been taken in cash from the 5 per cents, and avowedly paid into the 4 per cent loan, 1,130,000*l*. Now, practically, that is a conversion, because as much money has been contributed to the 4 per cent and 3½ per cent loans as has been taken from the 5 per cents, and therefore to that amount we have not paid cash, but have merely converted one denomination of stock into another. The House will perceive, therefore, that we have actually paid in cash the sum of 740,000*l*. only. The general result of the whole transaction, including both that portion which was executed prior to my accession to office, and the conversions which the Governor General has been able to effect in consequence of the directions which I sent to him, may be stated in a few words. The total sum to be operated upon amounted to 27,212,000*l*. There have been transferred directly or virtually in the manner I have described 25,765,000*l*., there have been taken in cash 1,447,000*l*., and the whole of the 5 per cent debt has been extinguished. Upon the portion which has been transferred there is a saving of 1 per cent, and upon the portion which has been paid off there is of course a saving of 5 per cent. The amount saved by the reduction of interest upon the amount transferred is 257,650*l*., and the saving upon the amount paid up in cash is 72,350*l*. making the annual saving upon the whole transaction 330,000*l*. I think that is a very satisfactory operation to be executed in the face of a local war just concluded and of a general war just commencing, and nothing could more clearly show the high estimation in which the stability of Indian finance is held by persons competent to form an opinion upon the subject. Now, Sir, there can be no doubt that, if I could have afforded it, there are two or three taxes in India which I should have been glad to have dealt with. There is the land tax of Madras, for example, which excited a great deal of disapprobation in the Select Committee, there is the Moturpha tax in the same presidency ; and there are likewise certain discriminating duties which ought to be abolished altogether. But I cannot forget, and I hope the House will not forget, that the whole of the saving which I have just mentioned will be absorbed in the proposed increased expenditure for education and public works ; and when I remember, too, that during last year there was a falling off in the opium revenue to the extent of about 600,000*l.*, I do not think I should be justified in urging upon the Indian Government any large reduction of taxation. With a deficiency last year of 800,000*l.*, with no prospect of any increase in the opium revenue, and with a certainty of an increased expenditure upon public works and education, I do not think it would be wise for me to recommend any reduction in the sources of revenue, although I admit—and Lord Dalhousie entirely agrees with me—that in many districts the land tax should be reduced. That will be done as soon as possible ; but I am afraid that in the meantime no such reduction can be made, at any rate to any considerable extent. I do not know that upon the question of finance it will be necessary for me to trouble the House at any greater length. I have stated what the income in 1852 was, what the expenditure was, and what the surplus was ; I have stated what the estimates are for 1853–4 ; I have shown that in some of the sources of expenditure there is a certainty of an increase, and I hope I have convinced the House that under all these circumstances it would be unwise to urge upon the Indian Government any considerable reduction of taxation. Having done so, I will now proceed to state, as shortly as I can, what the state of India is generally, and what have been the changes since last Session of Parliament. First of all, with respect to the political state of India, I may state that the principal event which has taken place since that time has been the complete settlement of the province of Pegu. No hostile attempt has been made against us on the part of the King of Ava. He is now satisfied that we do not intend to proceed further than we have already done. At the date of the last accounts trade was going on most satisfactorily both in Ava and Pegu. Our troops in Pegu were supplied with provisions from Ava, with the special leave and sanction of the King, and, in short, there was every prospect of friendly relations being speedily established between the British authorities and the King of Ava. I am sorry to say that large bands of freebooters were committing depredations in some of the districts ; but still I can state that even those districts were more tranquil at the dates of the last accounts than they ever were under the rule of Burmah itself. Pegu is exceedingly rich in productions of all kinds. A great part of the land is admirably adapted for the growth of cotton ; the timber is exceedingly valuable in the upper part of the province ; and, upon the whole, there seems to be every prospect, however unwilling we may have been to make the acquisition—and I can state that no man was more so than the Governor General himself—of the province becoming one of our most valuable possessions in India. The House is aware that the Rajah of Nagpore recently died without leaving any successor to his throne, and that his State has consequently been annexed to the British territories. In the North-Western Provinces an amount of tranquillity prevails which, I believe, is perfectly unexampled. It is notorious that in the districts beyond the Indus several of the tribes have for many years pursued their depredations unchecked, and that very great forbearance has been shown to them. I am glad to say that, after unavailing attempts by peaceable means to ensure freedom from their attacks, they have at last been coerced by the military force sent against them, and that for the last eighteen months not a sword has been drawn in those districts. Our exertions to establish tranquillity within our own frontiers have likewise been most successful, and such a state of tranquillity as now prevails over the whole of the North-Western Provinces has never been experienced before. Some time ago I wrote to the Governor General directing him to endeavour to establish friendly relations with the Afghans. I am happy to say that he has succeeded in that attempt. A treaty has been concluded with the Chief of Kelat, in which we have stipulated to aid him in putting down the bands of robbers that infest his dominions, while he has stipulated to give a free passage to our merchandise through his country, upon the payment of the small and simple duty of six rupees per camel load. I trust that treaty will be the means of extending British trade in Persia and the other countries which lie beyond Kelat in Southern Afghanistan, and that we shall derive many important advantages from our alliance with the Chief of that people. With respect to Cabool, after the events which have taken place within the last few years, it was not, of course, to be expected that we should be able to establish friendly relations with it immediately. Since 1849 there has been complete friendliness shown on our part to all persons coming from Cabool into the British territories. All the frontier duties have been taken off, and the communication between the two countries is now very considerable. It cannot be denied, however, that the Chief of Cabool appears to have entertained apprehensions of some further attack on our part, but measures have been taken to reassure him upon that head; and I am glad to say that approaches have recently been made to us, in that secret and reserved manner which forms an essential part of Indian diplomacy and negotiation. The officers upon our frontiers have been desired to reciprocate those approaches in the same friendly manner in which they are made; and I hope I shall be able, in the next Session of Parliament, to report the establishment of amicable relations with the Chief of Cabool. With regard to the great country beyond—Persia—she is placed in a somewhat difficult position between her two great neighbours who are now at war with each other. The Shah has professed, and has maintained, an unbroken neutrality, which is at once calculated to serve his own interests, and to secure the approval of at least one of the parties in the present struggle. Neutrality is the policy which we have all along urged upon him, and we hope he will be wise enough to continue it. So much, Sir, for the political state of our Indian empire, which is most satisfactory. I am happy to say that the attention of the Government of India, no longer distracted by external circumstances, has recently been turned to the internal improvement of the country. Early in the present Session a question was addressed to me with reference to the employment of Native judges. The only answer I could give at that time was, that I had called the attention of the Governor General to it. I am now happy to state that he, as Governor of Bengal, has laid before the Government of India a scheme for improving the condition and increasing the salaries of the Native judges in Bengal, and for placing them in a much higher position than they have ever hitherto occupied. He has likewise laid a scheme before them for the improvement of the police, for the inspection of gaols, and for the improvement of the roads. These measures have not yet received the final sanction of the Government of India; but I have no doubt that they will be pushed vigorously forward and carried efficiently into execution by the very able officer—Mr. Halliday—who has been recently appointed to preside over the Presidency of Bengal. With regard to the North-Western Provinces, I can never refer to them without expressing my regret at the serious loss they have sustained by the death of Mr. Thomason. A very able civil servant—Mr. Colvin—has been appointed to succeed him, and I have not the least doubt that this gentleman will discharge his important duties most efficiently. The only great event in the internal affairs of India which has taken place since last year has been the opening of that gigantic undertaking, the Ganges Canal, a work which, I believe, exceeds any other ever heard of, either in ancient or modern times. Without troubling the House with minute details, I may state, from a paper drawn up by Major Smith, the able engineer officer who succeeded Colonel Cautley in the superintendence of the works, that the length of the main canal, which will be used for the purposes both of irrigation and navigation, is 525 miles, and of the branches 373 miles; making altogether 898 miles. The breadth at the upper part is 140 feet, and in other places it is 80 feet, diminishing to 20 at its termination. The depth varies from 10 to 5 feet. The flow of water at the entrance is 6,750 cubic feet per second; the area of irrigation is about 1,500,000 acres, and the population deriving benefit from it amounts to about 6,000,000 of people. There are two watercourses over it, the one 300 and the other 200 feet wide, and the canal itself is carried over a valley in an aqueduct of magnificent proportions, composed of 15 arches of 50 feet span, and a waterway of 750 feet. Throughout its whole course there are side canals, where necessary, so that there cannot by any possibility be a stoppage in the navigation. Compare this gigantic undertaking with some of the existing works in other parts of the world. The principal Italian canals are only 114 miles long; the two great canals in Egypt are 120 miles in length; the Erie Canal is 363 miles long; the four largest French canals are only 582 miles in length; while the principal canals in Holland are not more than 400 miles. The Ganges Canal, therefore, is nearly twice as large as the greatest canals in any country in the world; and it has been constructed under the superintendence of a single man, Colonel Cantley, to whom the Governor General of India most deservedly paid the highest honours which it was in his power to bestow, and whom I had great satisfaction in recommending to Her Majesty, since he came home, for the distinction of the Bath, as an acknowledgment of the distinguished services he has rendered to the country. I will not trouble the House by any enumeration of what has been done in the Punjab; but I cannot help pointing out the remarkable fact that, although only three years have elapsed between the battle of Goojerat and the date of the Report on the administration of the Punjab, which is in the hands of Members, yet a large tract of country has been changed from a state of lawless violence to a state of peace and security, which is not surpassed in some of the oldest settlements in India. The land revenue has been reduced 25 per cent, the Customs duties have been repealed, and all this has been completed in little more than three years. This success has arisen from the adoption of what I hold to be a sound principle of Indian government, namely, European superintendence and Native agency; and the result is highly creditable to Lord Dalhousie, and the very able officers whom he employed. Here, too, they have opened about 1,350 miles of road, and surveyed about 5,200 miles more, and several hundred miles of canal have been commenced, in order to irrigate and bring into productive operation an enormous tract of country. In spite of the reduction of taxation there is still a surplus revenue. In 1849-50 that surplus was 520,000*l.*; in 1851-52 it was 626,000*l.*; in the next ten years, allowing for the great works in hand, it is estimated at 210,000*l.*, and after that at 500,000*l.*; so that, when about 250,000*l.* is deducted for military expenditure, there will be a considerable surplus in a country which has very recently been brought under British rule. Works are also in progress for the supply of water to the town of Bombay, which is much required; for it is a curious fact that one of the purposes to which the railway has been applied has been to bring fresh water into the town, a purpose which, among the many advantages the railway confers, was certainly not originally expected from it. In the Presidency of Madras, the Godavery annicut is nearly completed, that on the Kistnah is commenced, and we have sanctioned considerable further outlay on the Coleroon. The survey of the river Godavery has been partially made. We have ordered vessels to be sent out, of higher power and less draught of water, to complete it; and should the river be navigable, I will not say at all times, but for the greater portion of the year, it will open up one of the greatest cotton districts in India, and bring down that valuable product at a much cheaper rate than any transmission by railway, to the great advantage of the people of this country. With regard to the great railways of India, hon. Gentlemen are aware that the great difficulty has been the want of money, owing to the state of the money market. Up to last year there had been considerable delay, but the Government determined then that the great railways in India must at all events be made. The change of circumstances in the money market, just about the time that determination was come to, raised a difficulty which had not been anticipated; but steps have now been taken to prevent any further delay in the execution of the works. In Calcutta the line is by this time opened for forty-six miles, and the works for 120 miles more are under contract—the great obstacle to more rapid progress being the insufficient supply of iron rails from this country. The Madras Railroad is going on slowly, without any obstacles, and the Bombay line is opened for some distance. With regard to the lines to the north-east from Bombay, some doubt exists as to crossing the Ghauts, and until the country has been surveyed and reports sent in, it is impossible to decide on the exact course. In the meantime there is as much to be done on the line of railway towards Poonah as the railway company is likely to be able to accomplish, so that I do not consider that any time is really lost. In the last few months a work of much less difficulty, but of very great utility, has been nearly completed. The electric telegraph is laid down all the way from Calcutta to Agra, and from Agra to Bombay. It is, we know, in active operation, because messages have been received by it; and, I believe, by this time it will have been carried to Delhi. This important work has excited the greatest sympathy among the Natives of India, and it is satisfactory to find it can so easily be effected and maintained through the wild and desolate country which it must traverse in so great a distance. Great credit is due to the able officer, Dr. O'Shaughnessy, by whose zeal and skill this important work has been executed. An uniform postage, by means of a stamp, as in this country, has been established throughout India. The clothing of the troops has been put upon a proper footing, and various improvements of minor importance have been made, with which I will not now trouble the Committee. I will pass now to what has been done in execution of the provisions of the Act of Parliament of last Session. We have received intelligence of the assembling of the new Legislative Council at Calcutta, but it has only had time, subsequent to its meeting, to go through some formal proceedings. The House is, no doubt, aware that the Court of Directors, in conformity with another provision of the Act, have performed, with a single-minded view of what would be best for the public interest, the most painful task of reducing their own numbers to fifteen, and those numbers have been filled up by the addition of three named by the Crown. Some difficulty, it will be remembered, was anticipated that the Court so constituted might not work well together, but I am happy to say that such apprehensions have proved altogether unfounded. By the concurrent testimony of all parties, I am happy to say, no difference of the kind apprehended has existed, but the whole eighteen members have worked together as cordially as if they owed their origin to exactly the same authority. I feel here bound to bear my tribute of testimony to the assistance I have received from the whole of these Directors, and I think great advantage has been derived from their independent character, and the knowledge which they possess from having, as is the case with most of them, been so long in India. On all the important subjects which it has been my duty to bring before them I have found great readiness on their part to concur in what I thought necessary for the public interest. Passing from this point, it is desirable I should inform the House that the Law Commissioners appointed for the purpose of revising the imperfect legal procedures relating to India have not yet been enabled to bring into the shape of an Act of Parliament any measure which could be submitted for consideration this year; but I hope that, early next Session, I shall be able to carry out a Bill with a view to dealing with the Supreme Court in

Calcutta, and in India generally to revise the forms both of civil and criminal procedure. Though nothing has been done in this direction in the present year, I hope next Session that a proposition will be brought forward for the establishment of a system of procedure even more simple than the improved system recently introduced into this country by the common consent of the most advanced lawyers both in this and in the other House of Parliament. Upon this subject legislation in this country has made great strides within the last year or two, and it is highly desirable that India should have the benefit of our improved legislation. A Commission for inquiring into and revising legal procedure is also sitting at Calcutta, of whose labours we shall have the benefit. Between the two, therefore, I hope that the present form of Indian judicature may undergo complete revision, and that a simple mode of procedure, easily intelligible to the Natives, will bring justice home to every man's door in a way which certainly has not been the case hitherto. With regard to the regulations for the examination of the assistant surgeons, I believe I have already stated to the House on a previous occasion that the first examination will take place in January next; it will be conducted on the principles of competition, and henceforward the examination will be taken half-yearly. As respects the admission to Haileybury, I was in hopes to have been able to state the regulations under which students might be admitted there by competition. The House is, no doubt, aware that no nomination can take place since the operation of the Act in April last, but a certain number of nominations had been made before the time which have not been taken up, and of course until those have been taken up there can be no admission by competition. Some time since I requested a number of gentlemen, most of them friends of my own, who felt an interest in this subject to take it into their consideration. Among them was the right hon. Gentleman, Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Macaulay), Vice Chancellor of the London University, Mr. John Lefevre, Lord Ashburton, Jowett, a distinguished member of Balliol College, and the Rev. Henry Melvill, head of Haileybury. As soon as I am formed of the result of their deliberation I shall be enabled to promulgate the regulations which may be necessary with respect to admission to Haileybury, and next mer admission will probably take place by competition. There are now only two other subjects upon which I need trouble the House, both of which excited the greatest attention before the Committees of last year—I mean those of public works and education in India. The system of public works is one to which my attention was very early directed, and I could not but perceive the utter want of system with which they were conducted throughout India. The reports of Lord Elphinstone and of Lord Harris as to Bombay and Madras entirely confirm this view. Works appear to have been sanctioned and undertaken in India with very little regard to what could possibly be carried out, and it was impossible to know how much had been done or when it was done. Now, the estimates of public works in India ought to be framed annually, as they are in this country; and I have sent out a model upon which the estimates there should be framed, so that we may be informed what the total cost of each work will be, what has been the expenditure in each year, and what is required to complete it. So far as Bengal and the North-Western Provinces are concerned, there is already organised a separate department of public works, and I hope in the other provinces some similar system will before long be adopted, so that we shall have some responsible head for the management of this important department. The next essential consideration is the means of executing the works. Hitherto the only fund applicable in this way has been the surplus revenue in each district. Now, I thought that was not only bad economy, but was unduly postponing the benefit which the inhabitants, and ultimately the revenue, should derive from the execution of these works. I, therefore, have proposed to expend upon the main and principal public works as large a sum as may be found adequate for the purpose of completing them. Whilst the conversion of the 5 per cents was going on and we did not know what the drain on the treasury might be, we were obliged to reserve our balances in hand, but now we are at liberty to act more freely, and the Governor General is authorised to apply the necessary money to the execution of these great works. The real check upon the execution of these works not only now, but in former times, is the want of adequate superintendence. Money has been thrown away for the want of that superintendence.

The engineer officers are employed on this service to the utmost extent which is compatible with the efficiency of their corps. Officers are largely withdrawn from the other regiments; civil engineers are not to be had; and all we can do is to supply the deficiency as well and as rapidly as we can. I trust the colleges now being established will induce many to educate themselves as civil engineers; but it is now only too true that the superintendence is deficient, and there are no very obvious means of supplying that deficiency. I now come to the last, and certainly not the least important, subject on which I shall trouble the House, and that is, the measures taken for supplying the great want of education in India. It would be most unjust to many persons not to pay a tribute of praise to them for what they have done, or to deny that a great deal has been done for promoting education in India; but I think, at the same time, it was evident from the evidence given before the Committee, that a great deal still remained to be done. Sir Thomas Munro, Mr. Wilson, Sir Charles Trevelyan, Mr. Macaulay, Mr. Bethune, Dr. Mouatt, Mr. George Norton, and my hon. Friend opposite (Sir E. Perry), are among the persons to whom honour is due. The members of the various missionary societies have, likewise, been most energetic to promote the cause of education. But certainly no persons can give stronger testimony than those gentlemen who have done the most as to how much remains to be done. They, by experience, are acquainted with what is wanted, and can point out the best way to provide it. The system of education appears to be different in different provinces. In Bengal, English education has been pushed to a very high extent; there has been there a great demand for the acquisition of the English language, with a view to employment in the public offices; and hon. Members may have seen, in examination, papers used in Bengal, which were printed in the appendix to the Report of the Lords' Committee, questions which I confess I should be very sorry to have put to me, and which probably many Gentlemen round me would find some difficulty in answering. Accompanying that high English education, there has, however, been in Bengal a great neglect of the education of the masses of the people. On the other hand, in the North-Western Provinces, Mr. Thompson established a system of schools for the Natives, which the people were induced to attend; by the advantage to be derived from learning the mensuration of land and the mode of calculating their holdings, Dr. Mouatt, who has recently been the Secretary to the Council of Education in Bengal, admitted that in practical and useful knowledge conveyed to the people in the vernacular, the schools in Bengal were very far inferior to those established by Mr. Thomason in the North-West Provinces. In Bombay there are very good mixed English and vernacular schools, and in Madras Lord Elphinstone exhibited a remarkably good college; but religious disputes unfortunately have prevailed there, and, so far as Government schools go, they are worth very little. On the other hand, the efforts of the missionaries have been more developed in Madras than anywhere else, and the vernacular education of the missionary schools is carried to a far greater extent there than in any other part of India. The medical college of Calcutta produces most exceedingly skilful pupils, and, wherever medicine has been taught, it has been taught with very great success. The working college of Roorkee, which has taken the name of its founder, Mr. Thomason, promises very well in drawing out engineering abilities. In Calcutta, the Governor General has established a college where medicine, law, and civil engineering are taught, and this promises good results, for by far the greatest defect of the education given in India is its want of a practical character. I am far from underrating any part of the education which is imparted under the system now followed in the various provinces, but the great object of any system of education in India must be to extend it to the great body of the people. Hitherto the greatest expenditure in proportion to the numbers has been upon education of a high description, and this appears to us to be wrong. Education of the higher class may be left to the care of the parties themselves who are to benefit by it, and who can appreciate its advantages; but what is really wanted for India is the extension of education to the great body of the people, and this has been the main end kept in view in the proposals we have made. With this object, we shall take every desirable part of the system we see existing in one part of India or the other, and endeavour to form a scheme which may be adapted to the whole country, leaving the details to be filled up by the authorities on the spot. We lay down a general scheme which they are to work out as the circumstances of each district seem to require. The great features of the scheme are so fully explained in the despatch which has been placed in the hands of hon. Members, that it will be unnecessary for me to detain the House by dwelling upon them at any length, nor would it be possible for me to state the details with much minuteness, as these must differ in different places and with different circumstances, and it is proposed to leave them to be carried out on the spot by the officers employed in the educational department. Hon. Gentlemen are aware that in India, as I am sorry to say is the case in this country, religious differences oppose a very great obstacle to the adoption of any uniform system of education. We have determined, however, to carry out a system which, I believe, is likely to succeed—that is, a system of grants in aid to schools according to their wants and their means of imparting education, irrespective of any religious instruction administered in those schools. We propose to put them all under inspection, requiring certain things from them—certain things to be taught and done. Such schools will be reported upon, and, according to their compliance with these requirements, they will receive assistance from the Government. I repeat, however, that as regards all religious teaching we carefully abstain from any interference whatever. That has been the principle upon which Indian government has been conducted for many years past, and it is, I believe, the only safe system upon which it can be conducted in that country. I am perfectly convinced that if the Government were to introduce into India any system of education which should lead the Natives to suppose that we had a wish to proselytise them, it would only injure and prevent that result which we all wish to see produced—I mean the advancement of education. I am, therefore, most anxious it should be fully understood that we give assistance to missionary, to Mahomedan, to Hindoo schools, and to any schools, of whatever religious faith they may be; that we look only to the secular education imparted there, requiring it to be of sufficiently high standing, and requiring the education to be properly imparted; but that we in no way want to interfere with the religious belief or the religious teaching in those schools. We propose to establish universities in the great centres of the Indian presidencies on the model of the London University—that is, with the power of conferring degrees after examination, without themselves engaging in the instruction of students. The universities will be at the head of affiliated colleges or institutions, as is the case with the London University. The affiliated institutions will include colleges of any religious persuasion—missionary, Hindoo, Mahomedan, or Government colleges. Every place of instruction, indeed, which gives an education sufficiently high to enable a person to obtain a degree, may be affiliated. Below these colleges we propose to have schools of two different classes. I do not like to distinguish these schools by the terms “Anglo-vernacular” and “vernacular” schools, for these terms do not express what we mean; but probably in the lower of these classes it may be found impossible to teach anything but the Native language, whilst in the class of schools above them I hope that both the English language and the vernacular dialects of India will be taught. At present, one of the greatest difficulties interposed in the way of Native education is the want of books in the vernacular languages of which the contents are valuable and worth teaching, but to some extent at least this want may be supplied, and at all events we may confidently look forward to the greater diffusion of the English language amongst the Native population, and with it a knowledge of the science and arts of Europe. We propose to establish scholarships as prizes from the lower schools, presenting to the students rewards which the more diligent and exemplary may hope to obtain. We hope from amongst the better scholars to find some who may adopt the profession of teaching, and do something to supply the great want of educated schoolmasters. There have been many instances of Native students of superior endowments, well fitted for the vocation of schoolmasters, and whom we should be willing and anxious to train up as teachers by the establishment of normal and training schools for schoolmasters. We propose to place the whole of these institutions under constant inspection, and examinations will be regularly conducted under the eyes of the Government inspectors. We think, also, that instead of continuing the Councils of Education, it would be far better that the educational system should be under the control of a Government department. I am very far from underrating the exertions which have been made by these Native and English gentlemen who are members of the

Councils of Education, and I trust that most of them will continue to render their assistance in the promotion of education as members of the senates of the universities; but I think it is advisable that the system of education should be placed under the superintendence of a Government department. We also contemplate either the establishment of professional colleges or the appropriation of branches of the colleges to the purpose of instruction in professional knowledge. Students who display talent for particular professions—as, for instance, for engineering or medicine—may then be enabled to cultivate their abilities in these professional institutions. We shall thus provide, in truth, for promoting the education of the higher classes by the distinctions afforded in the universities for those who complete their education in the colleges, and for that of the mass of the people in the different classes of schools. In the lower class of schools we shall provide a native schoolmaster, with assistance in books and scholarships in the class above. For the upper class we shall give assistance towards the erection of school-houses, with scholarships to the colleges; and for the students most proficient in the end there will be scholarships in the training schools or the professional colleges. This is the scheme which, on the whole, I have thought it most advisable to adopt; but the Committee will give me credit for sincerity when I say that I have the greatest possible diffidence in my own judgment, and that I shall be overjoyed to have the assistance and advice of those who are competent, by their knowledge of the country, and acquaintance with the habits and dispositions of the Natives, to offer suggestions on this important subject. If, however, the scheme had rested entirely upon my own judgment, I should have hesitated in entertaining any very sanguine hope of its success; but I have consulted many gentlemen who, from the great interest they have taken in the question of education in India, were well qualified to afford sound advice upon the subject. I may content myself with observing that the plan has been submitted to Dr. Duff, with whom I had a long conversation regarding it, to my right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Macaulay), to the hon. and learned Member for Devonport (Sir E. Perry), to Mr. Marshman, Sir Edward Ryan, Dr. Mouatt (the Secretary to the Council of Education in Calcutta), to Mr. Beadon, and Mr. Seton Carr, to Mr.

Norton (who was President of the Council of Education at Madras), Mr. Prinsep, Mr. Baillie, as well as other gentlemen of eminence connected with the Indian service, and it is most gratifying to me to be able to state, without referring to details, that the general scheme which I have proposed has met with their approval. I trust, after the approbation they have expressed of the scheme, that it may be attended with satisfactory results. Much will depend on the hands to which the actual working of the system is confided; but when I look at the number of persons, both English and Native, who have devoted themselves to the cause of education in India, I cannot entertain a doubt that the adequate means of carrying it into execution will be found, and most earnestly do I pray that by the blessing of Providence its beneficial influence may be extended over the whole surface of that vast region, so that the grand and lasting result to which we may look forward will be the moral and religious improvement of its inhabitants.

SIR ERSKINE PERRY said, he trusted he should not be thought presumptuous if he ventured to take a part in this discussion, although he felt that he was more in need of indulgence than almost any one who had called the attention of the House to Indian affairs, for he was unable to bring before them any of those topics so well adapted to excite attention which had generally been urged in Indian debates. He was neither able to adduce such instances of misgovernment as had occasionally been brought forward, nor to paint such glowing pictures of prosperity as had been described by the hon. Member for Honiton (Sir J. Hogg) and other hon. Gentlemen. He (Sir E. Perry) hoped the Committee would believe that the opinions he was about to express had been formed without any personal bias one way or the other, his only object having been a sincere desire to ascertain the truth. He had heard the speech of the right hon. Baronet (Sir C. Wood) with unmixed gratification. He (Sir E. Perry) was satisfied that he represented the opinions of thinking people in India when he said, that that speech would be hailed as the most promising with regard to political prospects that had ever been addressed to them from this country. The right hon. Baronet had frankly admitted that the estimates he had framed presented what was certainly an alarming deficit, but, notwithstanding this circumstance, he had detailed the operations which he proposed with respect to four great subjects intimately connected with the prosperity of India. The despatches that had been laid upon the table showed that the right hon. Baronet had given to public works in India a stimulus such as those enterprises had never before received. The Governor General and the Governors of the different presidencies had been allowed to avail themselves of the large balances standing in the public Treasury, independently of the revenue of the year, in order to promote any public enterprise characterised by sound engineering skill, or which had local evidence in its favour. With respect to the judicial establishment, also, hints had been given to the Governor General as to the pay of Native judges—a subject on which so much evidence was taken before the Parliamentary Committees of last year, and on which a very strong feeling existed both in this country and in India. The right hon. Baronet had effected a very large and beneficial operation on the funded debt of India, by reducing the interest from 5 per cent to 4 per cent. If the tenure of the right hon. Gentleman's office was to be characterised by the measure of education he had sketched, he (Sir E. Perry) would be bold to say that the name of Sir Charles Wood would be linked by the grateful Natives of India with the two or three English names they loved to honour. He (Sir E. Perry) cordially concurred with every portion of the educational scheme of the right hon. Gentleman. For years past the educationists of India had been appealing to the home authorities for that assistance and encouragement which was now to be afforded them. They had previously appealed in vain for assistance to enable them to establish normal schools, training colleges, universities, and to promote education generally, but now, for the first time, did they find anything like large and general support extended to them by the home authorities. He considered that the gratitude of India was due to the right hon. Gentleman for having proposed these measures, which emanated, he believed, from the Board of Control. Although, however, he (Sir E. Perry) had listened to the speech of the right hon. Baronet with unmixed gratification, he could not help observing, from the demeanour of the House, and from the thinness of the benches, and even of the Treasury bench, that very little interest in discussions of this kind was shown within the walls of that House. It certainly might have been expected that the colleagues of the right hon. Baronet (Sir C. Wood) would have attended to hear what was certainly one of the most glowing pictures of India that had ever been drawn. He, however, attributed their absence and the dulness of demeanour that had characterised the House to the fact that discussions of this kind did not appear to lead to any practical result. He thought it was necessary, in order to excite the attention of the House, that hon. Members should feel that they were being instructed with a view to some operation on their part, or to some active demonstration to which they could lend aid. It had been the characteristic of all the Indian discussions of this nature that they took place in almost empty Houses. On the last occasion when a similar budget was opened, only about thirty Members were present, although the Duke of Wellington made an admirable speech in favour of his brother's administration. It was then, as it was now, and as it would continue to be, the general feeling of the House, that the information afforded by Indian discussions of this kind might be just as well gained from blue books. He (Sir E. Perry) thought, however, that a very important moral might be drawn from what they had heard from the President of the Board of Control to-night. If he (Sir E. Perry) had correctly characterised the scheme propounded by the right hon. Baronet for the government of India, it appeared to him the strongest argument that could be adduced in favour of a proposition brought before the House many times last year, as to the value of Parliamentary interference with respect to the great principles that should govern our rule in India. He attributed entirely to the Parliamentary discussions that had taken place, and to the Act that had emanated from them, the very great strides in administration which had been made with respect to India during the last twelve months. That Act very much enhanced the position of the President of the Board of Control; it greatly diminished the power of the Court of Directors; it threw increased responsibility upon the Ministers of the Crown; and the very statement that had been made that night afforded the strongest possible demonstration of the value of the plans propounded in that House last year. The proposition brought before the House last year was one which was most interesting to many thinking men out of doors; it occupied much public attention, and was re-echoed loudly by the press, and in the House was ably and eloquently urged by the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright), the main point being the general feeling which existed of the necessity of some Parliamentary influence with respect to the government of India. The hon. Member for Manchester brought forward his arguments on various occasions, always urging the necessity of such Parliamentary influence, and he (Sir E. Perry) took the liberty of saying, that the arguments by which the hon. Member for Manchester supported his propositions excited the admiration, if not of that House, of which at that time he (Sir E. Perry) was not a Member, of people out of doors, and he believed the soundness of his views, and the felicity with which he expressed those views, raised him, even in the opinion of Members of the House, to the highest rank of Parliamentary orators. In his own opinion, the breadth of the views propounded by that hon. Member, and the vigorous grasp he took of a difficult subject, convinced him that he was equal to all the exigencies of government, and was blessed with the possession of a statesmanlike mind, which, if he had had the opportunity, would place him in the first class of statesmen, as well as of Parliamentary debaters. He (Sir E. Perry) deduced from the topics which, upon the present occasion, had been so well brought forward by the right hon. Baronet the President of the Board of Control an argument in behalf of that position, and he was anxious to demonstrate that Parliament had never interfered with respect to India, except under the most beneficial auspices. It was a Parliamentary struggle which, twenty years ago, opened the trade of India to English merchants. It was by another Parliamentary struggle about the same period that the China trade was emancipated from monopoly; it was Parliament that first introduced education into India, that gave it that stimulus from which such great effects had resulted, and it was Parliament which by its last Act passed with reference to the subject, had interfered most beneficially to destroy what he conceived was one of the worst parts of the government of the Company—namely, the civil patronage it enjoyed, and which English statesmen knew had operated so injuriously to the good government of that country. The general objection brought forward to Parliamentary influence with India was, that it would reduce the Government of that empire to the condition of that of one of our Colonies, that Parliamentary influence with our Colonies had been generally deprecated, and Indian reformers were asked, whether they would have a system of ruling which was so deprecated introduced into that large country? That was the position which was thrust into their faces; but the House would observe there was one thing which, in the consideration of this matter, ought to be weighed most carefully; and that was, the extraordinary difference existing between the Colonies of this country and the empire of India. With respect to the Colonies in connection with this country, he might presume to speak with some degree of authority, having lived in one of them, and it would be found, as a general rule, that they were inhabited by an Anglo-Saxon democratic people, struggling for self-government, and animated by few of those feelings of interest in the aristocracy which appertained to the mother country. In general they had obtained self-government; they had, however, been unruly; the mother country had been annoyed during the struggle, but in the main they had succeeded in obtaining good government. India, on the contrary, was a large peninsula, a populous country, necessarily under a despotism, and it was, therefore, as utterly dissimilar in its condition to any of our Colonies as one country could be to another; to compare India with a colony was to compare two countries wholly different in their characteristics. It was, however, unnecessary to institute such a comparison, or to found any argument upon it, because we had an example of colonial government as applied to an Asiatic colony in direct juxtaposition with the government of India, and that example was to be found in the island of Ceylon, and he could show the House that that colony had during the last two or three years progressed in a more rapid and extraordinary manner than even India itself—

"In 1834 the first coffee estates were planted. In 1854 there were upwards of 300 plantations in full bearing, containing 60,000 acres of planted land. The capital thus invested by Europeans has been about 4,000,000*l.* Between the years 1838 and 1843 the Ceylon Government sold 250,000 acres of Crown land, and opened 800 miles of good carriage-road. There are now more than 3,000 miles of road in Ceylon. In 1837 the coffee shipped amounted to 43,000 cwt.; in 1852 to 324,000 cwt. In 1837 the value of the imports was 595,883*l.*, that of the exports 326,260*l.* In

That was the wonderful state of progress in that island during the period he had described, and it was entirely owing to European enterprise and the investment of European capital giving to that island large views of government. While, then, he expressed his own opinion as to the views which were brought forward last year upon this subject, and advocated so strongly, he entreated the House to remember the manner in which those views were met by the leading statesmen of this country; they were met in a manner which led to the material curtailment of the power of the Court of Directors, and to the transfer of that power, and with it the responsibility it entailed, to the Government. The Court of Directors was a mighty power; it had all the prestige attaching to the prolonged existence of 250 years; its antecedents and its history were the antecedents and the history of a power of no small importance. Its gigantic patronage had given it relations and interest in every household of the kingdom; its claims in the opinion of all sober-minded men were substantial, and on conservative affections could not be otherwise than great; but, notwithstanding all this, when the views to which he had referred were propounded in that House and disseminated out of doors, excepting the immediate retainers of the Company, not a single voice was raised in its favour. In no other way could that be explained than in this:—The leading statesmen of this country saw that the existing system had become effete—that it was no longer in harmony with the spirit of the times—and that the feeling had grown up in the minds of men that this mighty empire could only be governed and be increased with safety by those who, in a Parliamentary government like that of England, were placed at the head of affairs. Parliament required to know, and India required to know, how the government of 150,000,000 of the human race was to be conducted, and the circumstances of the time demanded that its administration should be brought under Parliamentary influence, for as long as another body existed, which practically had the government of India, they would never get a House—more than they had that night—to listen to a statement respecting Indian financial affairs or the progress of improvement in that country. If the right hon. Baronet or the House referred to the origin of the Indian speeches which they might read in Hansard, they would find that in many cases they were never made in the House at all, being the production of some clerk in the India House, who used to prepare them, and then, after Mr. Dundas had delivered a few sentences to the House, the MS. was handed over to Hansard; he was even told that the clerk in the Board of Control could show a number of the speeches got up in that manner. Unless, therefore, they got the ordinary Parliamentary motives to bear in relation to this question, it never could be a general subject of interest to the discussion of which hon. Members would aspire. He was glad to have had the opportunity of stating his views on this point, believing as he did that truth, although it might be told to an audience however small, would ascend in the world, and, being disseminated, take firm hold of the public mind, arming itself at last with irresistible power. He was unwilling to dwell longer on this subject, but he wished before he sat down to call the attention of the House to a point connected with finance, on which he conceived it might interfere most beneficially in the interest of India—he meant with respect to the propriety of an arrangement for bringing the offices of the Directors of the East India Company into close connection with the Government offices. That subject excited the attention of Parliament last Session, and if any hon. Gentleman would refer to the divisions which took place on it, he would find the House was almost equally divided on the question before them. The division, he recollected, was sixty-one to seventy-four, the proposition for bringing those offices together being negatived by a majority of thirteen, and in the minority of sixty-one would be found the names of a large number of Gentlemen on that side of the House who were known friends of India. The right hon. Baronet had detailed to them that evening the various expenses of India, and it certainly did strike him (Sir E. Perry) that it was most absurd that the offices of two consulting bodies should be more than four miles apart. He thought he could show the House how they could save to India at least 150,000*l.* The whole cost of what he might call the double government, taking it on the most moderate calculation, was as follows:—Salaries of Court of Directors (now 10,000*l.*), 7,568*l.*; of contingent expenses, consisting of repairs, taxes, &c., and petty charges, 32,062*l.*;

salaries, &c., of the secretaries and officers of Court of Directors, 94,387*l.*; Board of Control and establishment, 29,420*l.*; rent of India House and other buildings of the Company, at 6½ per cent on their own valuation of 506,919*l.*, 32,950*l.*; rent for India Board, on a valuation of 40,000*l.*, 2,600*l.*—making, in the whole, 198,987*l.* Now, let them contrast that with the cost of Government offices which transacted similar duties—he meant the Colonial Office, doing the business of fifty-three Governments, which amounted to 40,550*l.*, and if they added 10,000*l.* a year as salaries of the Court of Directors, supposing them to continue always in existence, the whole cost would be 50,550*l.*; therefore, the sum of 150,000*l.*, or near it, might be applied to the purposes shadowed forth by the right hon. Baronet. He trusted that some hon. Member with more experience than himself would favour the House with his opinion of the practicability of such an amalgamation, for if a saving to that extent could indeed be effected, it might be attended with the most important advantages to India, and he had sanguine hopes the matter would be investigated by the right hon. Baronet himself, as he (Sir E. Perry) had seen enough of the Government of India to know that their chief desire was to deal out justice to the Natives of that country, and in their supervision to correct what was wrong. He sympathised with the hon. Baronet the Member for Honiton (Sir J. Hogg), in the assertion, that an attempt to do justice had characterised the rule of the East India Company. With the mass of business that fell to a Member of Parliament, it was impossible to waste a day in conferring with a clerk at the India House on points upon which information was desired, and which the Board of Control did not contain. The governing mind upon various small points of Indian administration could only be found among the superior class of examiners of correspondence at the East India House. Great benefit would result from getting all the Government authorities of India into one building, situate in the immediate vicinity of the other Government offices. He should not have gone so fully into the subject in so thin a House, except that the opportunity of speaking upon Indian subjects arose so seldom that one, who like himself strongly felt the responsibility cast upon this country by Providence in regard to India, would not do his duty if he did not seize any occasion of this kind that might present itself. Any one who had studied Indian history must see that the temper of the times had greatly changed, and that the views of the public had been much enlarged since the discussions of this subject commenced; fifty or 100 years ago the question was how much money could be got out of India, and not how much the Government could benefit 150,000,000 of our fellow-subjects. But the right hon. Baronet the President of the Board of Control, and others, were becoming sensible of the holiness of our mission. Parliament was "rising to the height of this great argument." He was sure that the most enlightened minds were desirous that our government in India should assume the most liberal form of policy that was compatible with the despotism that must always exist in an Asiatic country. This policy was as sound as it was unselfish, and he was sure it was only by the adoption of this large and generous policy that Parliament could preserve the connection that now existed for the benefit of both countries, and which, if every act were conceived in the same spirit, would, he trusted, continue for countless generations.

MR. KINNAIRD said, that after the House had been sitting for ten hours, and after a speech from the President of the Board of Control which had occupied two hours and a half in its delivery, it would ill become him to trespass at any length upon the House. He wished, however, that the right hon. Baronet would take into consideration the propriety of sending out instructions, that the accounts should not be made up to April, but that they should be closed in December. The accounts would then reach this country in June, and the right hon. Baronet would not have to make his next speech to a House, the number of whose Members varied from eleven to thirteen, as had been the case to-night. He greatly regretted that this very important statement had been put off until the very close of the Session. He trusted that the public works for the benefit of the people would be continued, and he would suggest to the right hon. Baronet that the Governors of the four presidencies of Madras, Bombay, Bengal, and Agra, and the officer at the head of the administration of the principalities of Scinde, Pegu, and the Punjab, should be instructed, at the close of each year, following the example of the Earl of Elgin in the case of Canada, to draw up a Report of the progress which had been made in the departments of civil and criminal justice, the state of the finances, and the condition of commerce, the improvement in police, in roads, bridges, and internal communication, and also the progress that had been made in the education of the people, so as to give a distinct view of the position and prospects of the respective provinces. If such Reports were laid upon the table annually at the time of the Indian Budget, they would be of incalculable good. They would create a wholesome and a generous emulation among the Governors, and infuse a spirit of greater zeal into their operations. The annual account would enable Parliament, the press, and the public to compare the success of the measures of one period with another, and test the real progress of India. He believed that the government of India by this country had tended upon the whole to the benefit of the inhabitants, and he thought Parliament might boldly invite the criticism of the world upon it.

MR. HUME said, that the Reports upon the state of the different provinces of India, which his hon. Friend (Mr. Kinnaird) wished for, were regularly forwarded to the Court of Directors. [MR. KINNAIRD: But not to Parliament.] That was because the superintending officer of the Government in that House had never done his duty by calling for them. If the hon. Member would look at the Reports by Colonel Sykes, he would find that there were better Reports accessible to him of India than of England. It was not information that was wanted, but publicity. He believed that the Directors of the East India Company had determined to give greater publicity to their proceedings than hitherto, not only here, but in India, where the greatest mystery and secrecy had been observed. He was disappointed in the speech of the hon. Member for Devonport (Sir E. Perry), from whom he had expected a statement of what he had seen in India, and what he proposed to do for the people of that country. With regard to the accounts, if they were made up to the 30th of April, as at present, ample time would be afforded for having them correctly laid upon the table; and he thought, therefore, that no alteration was required in the date to which they were made up. He believed that the Government had taken the proper course for ascertaining the requirements of so large and diversified a class as the people of India, and he hoped the interest taken in that people would continue to increase in future. He felt the greatest gratification at the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Control. He had begun his administration well, and he (Mr. Hume) trusted that from this time forward we might expect to see an annual improvement in the state of our Indian empire. He did not himself wish for many of the alterations in the details of administration which had been referred to by previous speakers. What he desired was, such measures as would improve the condition of the Natives. And an excellent commencement in that direction had been made in the despatch which had just been sent out, directing the establishment of a system of education. That despatch proceeded upon the right principle of leaving the details of the scheme to be settled in India. For it was utterly impossible for any set of men here to point out the precise measures required for each district of a continent so diversified in character as was Hindostan. It was, however, requisite that that House should be kept informed of what was done, in order that it might be able to guard against any neglect. It was much to the credit of the Government that they proposed to give education to all without distinction of sect or creed. He hoped that in the next Session of Parliament the President of the Board of Control would lay on the table of the House the Resolutions which he intended to move some days before he made his speech. The Resolutions might have been a mere matter of form this year, but it would not be so in future. He could not agree with the right hon. Gentleman that it was impossible to improve the revenue of the Presidency of Madras. On the contrary, he thought that Colonel Cotton had conclusively proved that, by the introduction of improved means of communication, the condition of the people might be much improved, and consequently the revenue materially augmented. Let them consider what our facilities of communication had done for England. Well, he believed that India presented capabilities for equal improvement. Looking to the market which Australia would now afford for Indian produce, he was much mistaken if the large outlay on roads and canals which the Government had authorised would not be attended with a most beneficial effect both upon the credit of the country and of the revenue. In order, however, to attain this end, it was very desirable that more attention should be paid to irrigation than had been done for some time past, and that the Natives should be relieved from vexatious imposts like the Moturpha tax, the payment for water, and the tax on the sinking of wells. With regard to the military establishments of India, the right hon. Gentleman had correctly pointed out that the Native troops were numerous, and the British troops few. But he must press upon the Government the necessity of doing justice to the former troops, and to the 5,000 or 6,000 European officers who commanded them. They had at present much cause to complain that very little attention was often paid to their just claims. He must, in the most emphatic manner, express his dissent from the doctrines laid down by Lord Dalhousie with respect to the acquisition of provinces now under the rule of Native princes. We had now a great and important empire in India; we had 150,000,000 of people under our sway; and he (Mr. Hume) wished to see our measures directed to the improvement of the condition of our present subjects—to making them rich and happy—rather than to the acquisition of further territory. And more than that, he desired to see the Native princes of India following our example, and improving the condition of their dominions by the same measures which had been already successful in ours.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, there were many topics in the speech of the right hon. Baronet the President of the Board of Control which called for observation, but at that late hour he would only detain the Committee by adverting to one or two of them. He admitted the great improvement which had been made during the last twelve months in the government of India, which in a great measure was due to the influence and exertions of the right hon. Baronet. His minute on education would be received with approbation from one end of the country to the other; but, at the same time, he could not help telling him that, with regard to the salt tax and the supply of salt to India, he took an exceedingly erroneous view, and must have been greatly misinformed upon this branch of the subject. He differed from the right hon. Gentleman as regarded the state of the people of Bengal, which he had been told by well-informed persons was as bad as Madras. One great fact had come out from the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, namely, that there was a deficit of 800,000*l.*, and, therefore, it would be necessary to press upon the Government of India the necessity of retrenchment. One of the most obvious ways in which this reduction of expenditure could be effected, would be by making the regular cavalry irregular, which would diminish the cost by one-half. The regular cavalry was quite inefficient; and the only reason why it was kept up was, that the Directors might have the opportunity of giving away the commissions. The patronage of the Directors had been diminished; but it had now to be divided amongst fewer persons, so that each had more than fell to his share before the Charter Act of last year. So bad was the Madras regular cavalry, that out of eight regiments there was only one that had not mutinied or shot its officers. The right hon. Gentleman should press the Directors to adopt the policy of Sir Robert Peel, and to reduce or wholly abolish taxation upon the chief articles of consumption of the great mass of the population.

Mr. J. G. PHILLIMORE said, he fully concurred in the panegyrics which had been pronounced on the speech of the right hon. Gentleman; but he trusted that he would not be led away to prefer rapid to cheap transit. Another point in which he (Mr. J. G. Phillimore) took great interest was the navigation of the Godavery. Were that river made practicable for 500 miles it would do more for India than any other step that could be taken, and it would enable us to grow cotton at a much cheaper cost than could be done by America itself. As to the extension of our territory, he looked upon every annexation with apprehension. Our object ought to be, not to extend, but to improve, our possessions.

Mr. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he must complain that the officers of the Queen's service were by the existing rules placed in a most injurious and degrading position. He could understand why a preference should be given to officers in the Company's service; but this was not a matter of preference, but of absolute monopoly. An officer in the Queen's service might be a most able and distinguished man, but he was shut out from all the honours and emoluments of his profession, as long as there was any Company's officer that by any possibility could be presented to them. The true remedy would be to amalgamate the two services; for he thought that there should be but one service, and that the Queen's.

Mr. VINCENT SCULLY said, he thought it was unfortunate that the statement of the right hon. Baronet had not been made at an earlier period of the Session, and also that the Members connected with India were not in attendance in the House on so important an occasion. He thought the misfortunes of the people of India arose from the vice of the land tenures in that country, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would attend to that subject, as vicious tenures of land had been the ruin of the West Indies as well as of Ireland. The condition of the rural population of Poonah, in June, 1854, was of the worst description; they were literally famished, and thousands of them had been living on roots for the preceding four months, all because of the viciousness of the land tenures in that country.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he must beg to express the great gratification he felt at the approbation hon. Gentlemen had been pleased to bestow upon his statement. With regard to the observations upon minor points, he was quite aware that many improvements might be made. With regard to the debt, there might be found, at pages 43 and 44 of the Report, a full statement of it, and the interest paid. As to the universal confiscation of the property of Indian Princes, that was not near so universal as had been stated. He wished at the same time to correct a misapprehension under which his hon. Friend (Mr. V. Scully) laboured. Owing to the want of rain there had been last year a failure of the crops, and to that circumstance the destitution was to be attributed, and not to the state of the land tenure. With respect to the observations which had been made in relation to the Godavery, he had to observe that certain works had been recommended and executed for the improvement of the navigation, and that further works were contemplated for the like object, so as to carry the navigation, if possible, into the heart of the country, and render the river navigable as far as possible.

Resolved—

1. "That the total net Revenues of the Bengal Presidency, for the year ended the 30th day of April, 1852, amounted to 7,584,435*l.* sterling; and the Charges thereof for the same period, other than Military Charges, amounted to 1,926,362*l.* sterling."

Resolved—

2. "That the total net Revenues of the North Western Provinces, including the newly acquired Territory, for the year ended the 30th day of April, 1852, amounted to 5,670,715*l.* sterling; and the Charges thereof for the same period, other than Military Charges, amounted to 1,402,235*l.* sterling."

Mr. D. Seymour

Resolved—

8. "That the net Revenues of Bengal and the North Western Provinces, together, for the year ended the 30th day of April, 1852, amounted to 13,255,150*l.* sterling; and the Charges thereupon, including the Military Charges, amounted to 8,770,880*l.* sterling, leaving a surplus available for the general Charges of India of 4,484,270*l.*

Resolved—

4. "That the total net Revenues of the Madras Presidency (Fort St. George), for the year ended the 30th day of April, 1852, amounted to 3,704,048*l.* sterling; and the net Charges thereof, for the same period, amounted to 3,204,273*l.* sterling, leaving a surplus available for the general Charges of India of 499,775*l.* sterling."

Resolved—

5. "That the total net Revenues of the Bombay Presidency, for the year ended the 30th day of April, 1852, amounted to 2,868,298*l.* sterling; and the net Charges thereof, for the same period, amounted to 2,847,392*l.* sterling, leaving a surplus available for the general Charges of India of 20,906*l.* sterling."

Resolved—

6. "That the total net Revenues of the several Presidencies, for the year ended the 30th day of April, 1852, amounted to 19,827,496*l.* sterling; and the Charges thereof amounted to 14,822,496*l.* sterling, leaving a surplus Revenue of 5,005,000*l.* sterling."

Resolved—

7. "That the Interest on the Registered Debt of India paid in the year ended the 30th day of April, 1852, amounted to 1,967,859*l.* sterling, and the Charges defrayed in England on account of the Indian Territory in the same period amounted to 2,506,377*l.* sterling, leaving a surplus of Indian Income for the year ended as aforesaid, after defraying the above Interest and Charges, of 531,265*l.* sterling."

House resumed.

MEDICAL GRADUATES (UNIVERSITY OF LONDON) BILL.

Order for consideration of Lords' Amendments read.

MR. MOWBRAY said, he rose to call attention to the circumstance that those Amendments excluded the University of Durham from the operation of the Bill, which had only been originally included in it after a very considerable discussion in that House. Now, he must say, after the question had undergone so complete an investigation—after the proposal had met with the sanction of Her Majesty's Ministers in that House, he was entirely unprepared to find, without any previous notification of such an intention, an Amendment made by a Cabinet Minister in the other House, and supported by another Cabinet Minister, to the effect of excluding the University of Durham from the Bill. Still he was not without hope that the noble Viscount the Secretary for the Home Department, on a reconsideration of the subject, would see fit to reinsert the name of the University of Durham in the Bill.

Notice taken, that Forty Members were not present; House counted; and Forty Members not being present,

RUSSIAN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES BILL—RESOLUTION.

EARL FORTESCUE moved the Resolution of which he had given notice—

"That as regards the Russian Government Securities Bill, the war with Russia, and the attempt now making by that Power to procure a loan for the carrying on of that war, render it urgent that every means should be immediately taken to prevent any British capital from being applied to the objects of that or any future Russian loan during the continuance of the war; it is therefore reasonable that this Bill should, notwithstanding the late period at which it has been brought up from the House of Commons, be taken into immediate consideration; and if the House shall think fit so to order, be read a second time this day."

He had only to say, in asking their Lordships' assent to this Resolution, that whatever might be their Lordships' opinion as to the merits of the Bill, he thought they would agree that a measure which had for its object to defeat a great financial operation now being carried on by the Russian Government, after having passed the House of Commons by a large majority, ought not to be put aside without discussion in that House on the simple ground of its having come up from the other House at so late a period of the Session.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, he should certainly support the Motion of his noble Friend, and, if it were agreed to by their Lordships, would then support the Bill of which his noble Friend was to move the second reading. He was not, however, at all prepared to say that this Bill, even in the form in which it had come up from the House of Commons, was rendered very necessary on account of the present state of the law, and he should be sorry to recognise any such proposition. At the same time the Bill had been denuded of many of the objectionable features which they had reason to believe it contained on its first introduction into the other House; and he should be sorry, either on the part of the Government or his own, to throw any obstacles in the way of passing a measure which had been considered by the other House of Parliament necessary to enable Her Majesty's Government to have more easily available means at command for checking the financial operations of the public enemy. He thought it desirable that their Lordships should know that Government had not neglected the subject to which the Bill referred. The moment that there was an announcement made on the Exchanges of this and other countries that Russia was about to endeavour to contract a loan, Her Majesty's Government, without twenty-four hours' delay, took the opinion of the law officers of the Crown how far it would be legal for British subjects to have any concern with a transaction the obvious intentions of which was to enable a foreign Power to raise forces which would be used for a purpose adverse to this Crown and nation. The law officers of the Crown gave it as their distinct and positive opinion that it would be high treason on the part of any British subject to be parties to such a transaction; and thereupon, without a moment's delay, his noble Friend at the head of the Foreign Office wrote to our Ministers at foreign Courts, and to the Consuls in the chief towns of the Continent, desiring them to make public intimation, and to spread it as widely as possible, that British subjects would incur this heavy penalty if they involved themselves in any transaction connected with the proposed loan. That their Lordships might see that these steps were as immediate as he had mentioned, he might state that even from the United States of North America answers had been received to the communications sent out at that time. This was not the only step taken by Her Majesty's Government; for they communicated also with our Ministers at foreign Courts, desiring them to make an earnest appeal to the Courts to which they were accredited, that they would, to the utmost of their power, throw obstacles in the way of this loan, inasmuch as we had a right to consider that its negotiation would be at variance with the character of neutrality or of alliance existing between these Courts and Her Majesty. Answers to those notes likewise had been received. He mentioned these facts in order that their Lordships might see, in the first place, that this question had not been neglected by Her Majesty's Government; and, in the second, that strong powers already existed to meet the case against which this measure was directed. At the same time, thinking it well, if it were possible, by making this offence a misdemeanor where the present law made it high treason, and thus mitigating the penalty, to render it more easy to thwart the enemy's measures—assuming that there might be some merit in the Bill—but, at any rate, feeling that it would be undesirable that their Lordships should throw it out when the other House had passed it for a limited but important object—feeling that it would do no harm, and might do some good—he trusted their Lordships would consent to the Motion of his noble Friend and pass the Bill.

LORD REDESDALE said, that after the reasons stated by the noble Duke, he certainly did not mean to offer any opposition to this Bill. As regarded the Resolution, he thought it quite clear that any measure which the Lower House sent up, even at this late period of the Session, having relation to the position in which the country stood at present, involved in war with Russia, did constitute a case of urgency. There could be no doubt whatever that the Resolution would allow the Bill to be proceeded with. With respect to the general question of their Lordships' Resolution of May last, he was decidedly of opinion that it would operate beneficially, by affording more time for the consideration of legislative measures in that House, and that it would thus work favourably to the conservation of the privileges of the other House of Parliament, as well as of their Lordships.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

EARL FORTESCUE moved the second reading of the Bill. The noble Earl said, that notwithstanding the statement of the noble Duke, that everything that could be done by the Government, under the existing law, had been done to prevent British subjects from dealing in the securities to which allusion had been made, he could not but think that, in the present state of affairs, this measure was necessary. It should be understood that the Bill did not at all extend the severity of the common law or the pains and penalties of high treason beyond their present limits, but simply imposed the penalty of a misdemeanor on all British subjects, at home or abroad, who might knowingly or wilfully trade in Russian securities during the continuance of the war. There had been three principal objections, somewhat contradictory of each other brought against the measure—first, that it would be inoperative, inasmuch as it would be easily evaded; secondly, that it was unnecessary, inasmuch as no British subject would embark in such dealings; thirdly, that it would be a vexatious infringement of the freedom of the subject in commercial and monetary affairs. To these he would reply—first, that though hardly any Act could be so framed that the perverse ingenuity of some rogue might not evade it, this Bill at least made the law clear, and inflicted a penalty which could be easily enforced; secondly, that, though the higher class of our money dealers might scorn the dirty work, it was not clear that the gains of 2 or 3 per cent might not induce less reputable persons to take an interest in a loan of this description if they could do so with impunity; and thirdly, that there was no just ground for representing as oppressive to any one a simple measure of public security, taken at a moment when we were engaged in a contest of the most formidable character, to prevent the resources of our own country from being applied to the service of our enemy in carrying on that contest. Another objection which had been made was, that the measure was not introduced or taken up, in the first instance, by Her Majesty's Government. The noble Duke had stated the reasons why the Government had not introduced some such Bill. But, although the Bill was brought forward by an independent Member, it was generally approved of by the responsible Ministers of the Crown in the other House; and having been submitted to the law officers of the Crown, who made such alterations as they thought would confine its operation strictly to the objects which it was intended to effect, it had been sanctioned by very large majorities of that House. He wished it had been intrusted here to some one better qualified than himself to do justice to its importance, but, having been requested to move it by those most interested in its success, he had felt it his duty to do so, and he hoped that their Lordships would give it their support.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^d.

LORD CAMPBELL said, he did not rise to oppose the Bill, on the contrary he approved of it; and, he must say, he had never heard the object of any Bill more lucidly explained than had been done in the present case by his noble Friend. He could not help observing that the support given to the measure by the noble Duke (the Duke of Newcastle) on the part of the Government seemed to him but of a tepid, if not of a cold, description. He apprehended that by the common law of England any contract made between an English subject and an alien enemy during time of war was illegal, and, under certain circumstances, might amount to high treason. He did not, however, think that the common law by itself, and without the assistance of a statutable enactment, was sufficient to secure the attainment of the object now in view; because, by the law as it stood now, there was no power by which it could be enforced, and therefore, under certain circumstances, an English subject might deal in the scrip of a Russian loan with impunity. If, therefore, they passed the Bill as it at present stood, it would be almost entirely nugatory. He apprehended that one of the great objects sought by the measure was to prevent the negotiation of scrip by subjects of the realm of England in foreign parts; but as it stood at present it failed entirely in accomplishing that intention. He suggested, therefore, that that defect should be remedied by the insertion of a clause to the effect that any offence committed against the Act beyond the limits of the United Kingdom might be inquired into, dealt with, and punished in the same manner as if it had been committed in the county of Middlesex. Such a clause would be effective against the operations of British subjects in scrip of this description in Germany, France, or any part of the world; but, inasmuch as by the common law of the land indictable offences could only be dealt with through the medium of a grand jury, which could have no cognisance of an offence committed in a foreign country, with certain exceptions, under particular Acts, in the cases of felony, such a provision was absolutely necessary to render the Bill in any degree useful. He trusted, therefore, such a provision would be added in Committee, and he should be happy to give his assistance in drawing it up.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, no doubt his noble Friend who had charge of the Bill would be most happy to avail himself of the assistance of the noble and learned Lord in preparing such a clause, which, however, might be more conveniently added on the third reading.

EARL FORTESCUE said, he felt fully the value of the suggestion urged by his noble and learned Friend (Lord Campbell), but he feared, considering the near approach of the prorogation of Parliament, that any alteration of the Bill would be fatal to its passing during the present Session.

LORD CAMPBELL did not wish to throw the slightest obstacle in the way of the Bill passing; but he assured the House if it was adopted in its present state it would not be of the slightest value, and he therefore hoped that such a clause as he had suggested might be added, notwithstanding the late period of the Session.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, he thought his noble and learned Friend had amply justified him for the "tepid" support which it was said he had given to the measure; for he (Lord Campbell) had clearly proved that if it was passed in its present form, it would be utterly and entirely useless. He (the Duke of Newcastle) was not willing to pass a measure which, in the opinion of so eminent a Judge, would be a dead letter, but would rather allow it to drop if it was to remain liable to such condemnation. What he should propose was, that they should now pass the second reading, negative the Committee, and fix the third reading for the following day; they could then add the clause suggested by his noble and learned Friend, to which there would still be time to obtain the assent of the House of Commons.

Bill read 2^a; Committee negatived; and Bill to be read 3^a To-morrow.

SLAVE TRADE TREATIES BILL.

On the Question that the Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) Bill be read a third time,

MR. HUME said, he wished to draw the attention of the House to the important Report which had been recently laid on the table by the Committee on Slave Trade

The Lord Chancellor

Treaties appointed last year. That Report was in many respects of an exceedingly gratifying character. Captain Seymour, of Her Majesty's ship Firefly, the last officer from the West Coast of Africa, had stated in his evidence that the slave trade had entirely ceased in many places where it had formerly flourished, and that in the years 1850-51, on the whole coast, not one vessel with slaves on board was captured; that a legitimate trade was springing up along the whole coast in the produce of the country; that he had lately counted at Benguela (formerly a noted slave park) as many as fourteen merchant vessels at one time, all engaged in legitimate commerce; and that, in fact, wherever the slave trade had ceased, commerce was commencing. The Committee said it had been stated to them that if the demand for slaves at Cuba were to cease, the slave trade in Africa would also cease; for it appeared that as soon as the market of the Brazils was closed, the slave trade on the West Coast of Africa, south of the line, was all but put an end to. Captain Seymour also said that if the market at Cuba were abolished, very few British ships of war would be required on the African coast, and those only for the protection of our commerce which was now becoming very large. Captain Cospatriek Baillie Hamilton, of Her Majesty's ship Vestal, likewise reported to the Committee the great publicity that existed as to the carrying on of the slave trade in the inland of Cuba. He stated that slave vessels had been fitted out under the guns of Spanish ships of war; that great facilities were afforded to the importation of negroes, for when once a landing had been effected, they were considered as natives; and that steam vessels, employed in carrying the Government mails from port to port, had been used to land slaves. Mr. Craufurd, who had rendered many meritorious services in the suppression of the traffic, stated in a recent despatch, that in the last seven months there had been more activity shown in the slave trade than during any previous period since 1844. That Gentleman gave a list of 10,000 slaves that had been landed in Cuba in the last six months prior to the date of his letter. On this point the Report of the Committee contained the following important paragraph—

"Your Committee concur in the opinion of these naval officers, that the slave trade would soon be extinct if the Cuban market were closed; and, therefore, consider the present time, when there are Spanish troops at every port and station of the island, and also numerous Spanish ships of war cruising on the coast, most favourable for the renewal of the united efforts of Great Britain, France, and the United States, to remove the reproach which the continuance of the slave trade in Cuba casts upon the civilisation of Christendom."

The great obstacle to the abolition of the Cuban slave trade, however, had been the venality of the Spanish officials; and it was not surprising that such should be the case, when it was borne in mind that even members of the royal family were mixed up in these disgraceful transactions. The Report further said—

"Other witnesses have stated to the Committee, that it was quite notorious at the Havanna that money was taken by the public officers of all ranks, from the Captain General downwards, for their connivance at the traffic in slaves; and further, that capital, notoriously belonging to Spaniards of great distinction at Madrid, was employed to carry on that traffic. That, in fact, the influence of these persons of rank and station at Madrid was believed to have been sufficiently powerful to procure the recall of an honest officer. That thus the Spanish Government have been induced to violate their treaties, and to suffer these persons to obtain large profits, by the continuance of that detestable traffic."

On this particular point the Report made the following pertinent remarks—

"Your Committee are of opinion that history does not record a more decided breach of national honour, than the letter of the Earl of Aberdeen establishes against Spain. The efforts of Viscount Palmerston, in subsequent years, to induce the Spanish Government to fulfil their engagements, appear in every despatch of that noble Lord, and it would be superfluous to detail them."

The House of Lords had also had a Committee on the slave trade. They reported that—

"In their judgment it was worthy of consideration whether the three great maritime powers, France, the United States, and Great Britain, could not, at the present time, be brought to combine in joint representations, and, if need be, active measures for obtaining from Spain and Brazil an actual suppression of this traffic."

He (Mr. Hume) thought that as Queen Christina, who had been the chief abettor of the Cuban slave trade, had been happily expelled, a favourable opportunity now offered itself to Her Majesty's Government, in concert with the other powers, to press upon the new Government of Spain the necessity of fulfilling their engagements. He had intended to have moved an Address on the subject, but as the forms of the House would not now allow him to do so, he was perfectly satisfied to leave the matter in the hands of the Government, who had done everything, he believed, in

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, in reference to the observations which have just fallen from my hon. Friend the Member for Montrose, I may state that it is no doubt a disgraceful proceeding that, after Great Britain, France, the United States, and all the maritime powers of Europe—that after the Empire of Brazil has rigorously prohibited the slave trade—the traffic in slaves should still be carried on in the island of Cuba under the protection of Spain. Some measures have, however, lately been taken upon the part of the Spanish Government, with reference to the question of the suppression of the slave trade, to which no allusion is made in the Report to which my hon. Friend has just called the attention of the House, and to those measures I shall now briefly refer. In the month of February, 1854, there was an order of a most stringent character issued, containing regulations according to which captured slaves recently brought into the island should be liberated. Now, this decree may seem to be one which is hardly in accordance with those just expectations with respect to the measures which ought to be resorted to for the suppression of the slave trade which the people of this country and of the civilised world entertain. Mr. Cranford, however, to whom my hon. Friend has just adverted in terms of deserved praise, places faith in the sincerity of the intentions with which that decree was framed, and describes its operation as being one of a beneficial character. It has been acted upon on several occasions, and has been followed by the enactment of further regulations of a corresponding nature, which regulations, also, the executive authorities in Cuba have carried into effect. In the month of March last 600 newly-arrived slaves were captured by those authorities, and an order was subsequently issued to the effect that all persons holding civil authority in the island of Cuba who should fail to report the arrival of any fresh supplies of slaves should be dismissed from their offices, and should afterwards be subjected to further penalties. In the month of May last a further importation of 600 negroes were landed upon that island, and were placed upon a certain estate, where it was believed that they might remain undiscovered and in security. The Governor General, however, having ascertained the fact, appealed to the tribunal empowered to deal with those cases, stating that the importation in question was one of a contraband nature; and having subsequently issued an order under which the 600 negroes were seized upon the estate and then liberated, the whole of the proceeding was by the verdict of the tribunal held to be justifiable. Other measures have also been adopted by the Governor General which show that he is quite in earnest in the endeavour to suppress the slave trade in Cuba. Several officers who did not obey his orders in this matter have been superseded, and an intimation has been conveyed to the others that unless they duly discharge the duties imposed upon them with reference to it they will be immediately removed from their offices. Now, it is quite obvious that, if such measures as these are carried fully and fairly into effect, the importation of slaves into Cuba will be prevented. Under the existing law in that island it is provided that the number of slaves upon each estate should be registered; and, therefore, when any large number—such, for instance, as the 600 negroes to which he had just adverted should be registered all at once by any estate-holder—that circumstance would in itself be sufficient to excite suspicion, and to direct towards it the attention of the authorities. With respect to that venality upon the part of the Spanish Government to which my hon. Friend has referred, and by which all our endeavours completely to suppress the slave trade have hitherto been frustrated, I can only say that I hope it is now at an end. It is a notorious fact—and therefore I can have no hesitation in alluding to the matter now—that Queen Christina has derived very considerable profit from the traffic which has been maintained in slaves in the island of Cuba. Changes, however, have of late taken place in the Spanish Government. General Concha has been made Governor General of Cuba, while Espartero, Duke of Victoria, is at present at the head of the Spanish Government. Now, with respect to the latter nobleman, I have known him long, and I have every reason to say that a person of greater integrity, or one animated by more liberal views upon every subject, could not be found. I am quite sure that he will discountenance the slave trade, and that anything like the venality and corruption hitherto practised in Spain with respect to it will from him meet with the severest reprobation. I only trust that he may be enabled to impress upon the new Government of Spain, and upon all the Spanish authorities, that the whole credit of his administration would be forfeited if this disgraceful traffic in slaves is allowed to be continued in future. I quite agree with my hon. Friend that we should as earnestly as possible, and at as early a period as we can, impress upon the new Government of Spain the necessity which exists for adopting such measures as may put an end to the trade in slaves. We know perfectly well that my noble Friend Lord Aberdeen has urged repeatedly, with reference to Spain, that it only required the possession upon her part of earnestness and sincerity to effect that which the exercise of those qualities has, in the case of France, Great Britain, and every other country, already accomplished. I agree with my hon. Friend in thinking that it is not necessary to move an Address to the Crown upon the subject of his observations. He may be well assured that the Government will keep a watchful eye upon the question, and that, setting aside all interested motives so far as we ourselves are concerned, the accomplishment of that great work—the total suppression of the slave trade, and the consequent civilisation of Africa—is an object which the Government will continue to have always at heart, and is one which I trust we shall be enabled to attain.

SIR GEORGE PECHILL said, he would entreat the noble Lord to take advantage of the present favourable moment to renew the endeavours of this Government to induce Spain to put an end to the slave trade in Cuba. One very great difficulty which had hitherto existed in our efforts to prevent the abominable traffic was the non-sufficiency of cruisers on the coast of Cuba, and the fact that they were not of a proper description. It was almost useless to employ vessels which drew more than eleven feet of water, and which were incapable of chasing slavers into the shallow waters on the coast of Cuba.

FINANCIAL OPERATIONS OF THE GOVERNMENT.

SIR H. WILLOUGHBY here rose, and said, he wished to call the attention of the House to two or three points of recent financial operations. At the commencement of the present Session the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, appeared to lay down the very important principle that, though we were carrying on an expensive war, the supplies which would be necessary to be raised within the year should be defrayed by funds derived from taxation within that year. Now, he very much doubted the possibility of their succeeding in that object. The first question he wished to ask was, how we stood in that respect? The first Budget of the right hon. Gentleman assumed an expenditure of 56,000,000*l.*, and a short time afterwards that estimated expenditure was increased to 62,000,000*l.* He apprehended it was pretty certain that, including the Vote of Credit of 3,000,000*l.*, the expenditure of the country during the year would be from 64,000,000*l.* to 65,000,000*l.*, and, indeed, he greatly suspected that that would not be the whole expenditure within the year, when we came to the end of the financial year 1854-5. Taking it, however—as it appeared from the papers on the table of the House—at something between 64,000,000*l.* and 65,000,000*l.*, the question he wished to put to the right hon. Gentleman was this—Would the expenditure be defrayed by taxes within the year; or, if that were not possible, and the principle which was laid down at the commencement of the Session could not be carried into effect, to what extent would the right hon. Gentleman be compelled to abandon that principle? Or, in other words, what amount of debt, in some shape or other, must this country contract in order to meet the amount of its expenditure? In addition to the ordinary expenditure, he would remind the right hon. Gentleman that there was a little bill to the amount of some 805,000*l.* presented by the East India Company for the balance of expenses during the Chinese war, and he should be glad if the right hon. Gentleman would explain whether this entered into his calculations. There was another point to which he wished to direct the attention of the right hon. Gentleman and of the House. He observed that the right hon. Gentleman had been selling savings bank stock; and he (Sir H. Willoughby) confessed that he took a very serious view of that operation. It appeared that in the month of June last the right hon. Gentleman had in ten sales disposed of 617,000*l.* worth of three per cent savings bank stock, at prices varying from ninety-one to ninety-four and a fraction. He also perceived that in the same month the right hon. Gentleman had bought on account of the savings banks 750,000*l.* of Exchequer bills. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Not

Exchequer bills.] Well, perhaps, the right hon. Gentleman would give them some explanation upon that point; but he (Sir H. Willoughby) had certainly understood that those were the bills which had been bought. At all events, some species of public bills had been purchased by the right hon. Gentleman to that amount; and, in his opinion, that was a very serious transaction. Now, he wanted to know if the House could think it a safe system of finance that, with the large amount of stock to the credit of the savings banks, any Chancellor of the Exchequer should be allowed to exercise a power of selling savings bank stock and of buying any species of bills? Could it be right and fair that any Chancellor of the Exchequer should have this general power, without the knowledge of the public and without the authority of this House, to convert this stock and to buy bills? This seemed to him a most dangerous power—one which was most injurious to the savings banks, and which was also a most injurious transaction as regarded the public, who looked to the stocks as operated upon only by sales between individuals or by such transactions as were authorised by that House. He would also ask, did the right hon. Gentleman contemplate converting any of this stock into new three per cent stock? It was now in the power of any Chancellor of the Exchequer, without leave or licence from that House, to create what was virtually a new and fresh debt, and to add to the amount of the three per cent stock of this kingdom. This was a monstrous power and one which, if it were well understood, he believed that House would not give to any Minister. He contended that the operation to which he referred was a loss to the savings banks, and this point involved a great constitutional question. He admitted that the extent to which the transaction had gone in the present year was not very great; but we knew that, when Lord Monteagle was Chancellor of the Exchequer, these operations had gone on to a great extent, and had led to very serious loss. He hoped that upon the points to which he had referred the House would receive a satisfactory explanation from the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

THE CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Sir, the hon. Baronet has divided his remarks, and I will also divide my reply to them, into two branches. The first relates to the general state of the public revenue and expenditure; and the second relates to the savings bank stock. Now, with respect to the state of the public revenue and expenditure, I really do not think I can add anything to what I stated to the House at considerable length on two former occasions in the course of the present Session. I am very happy to be able to say, that although a time of war is necessarily a time of very great uncertainty; although it is a time when you may naturally expect your expenses to run beyond your estimates, and your revenue to fall short of them, yet at the present moment—on the 9th of August—I do not see any reason, in any respect, to retract or qualify any estimate I made, or any expectation I held out to this House—on the 8th of May—when I submitted to them the financial statement on which the subsequent proposals of the Government, and the subsequent Votes of the House, with respect to our financial arrangements, were founded, I am bound to say, that up to the present moment I am entirely satisfied with the state of the revenue and finances of the country. I think I may as well take this opportunity of giving an explanation to the House, which will not occupy me many minutes, with reference to the last quarterly statement of the revenue, which seems to have made upon the minds of some persons an impression less favourable than the facts of the case would, in my opinion, warrant. It will be recollected that the last quarterly statement of the revenue showed a decrease, as compared with the statement of the corresponding quarter of the preceding year, in the permanent branches of the revenue, to the extent of about 570,000*l.* But I consider it right that I should show the House how dangerous it is to form hasty judgments from statements of that character, which are very partial, and which are, perhaps, not so happily adjusted and arranged as they might be. With regard to the last quarterly statement, I think I can show that the apparent decrease of revenue which it exhibited was entirely fallacious; and I will now proceed to point out why it was fallacious. In the first place, it must be recollected that last year the House was pleased, on my Motion, to pass a Bill authorising the payment of advances for metropolitan improvements. The first effect of that measure was, that in the second quarter of the year 1853 a sum of about 140,000*l.* was paid to the credit of the land revenue of the Crown as being due to it on account of the transactions of former years.

This 140,000*l.* had, of course, nothing to do with the revenue of that year; but although they had nothing to do with the real revenue of the year, they formed an apparent portion of the receipts during the second quarter of the year 1853, and in comparing the revenue of the second quarter of that year with the revenue of the corresponding quarter of the present year, which shows, according to the published statement, a deficiency of 570,000*l.*, you must deduct from that deficiency, in the first place, this 140,000*l.* There is another item in the statement which I wish to explain to the House. On the 6th of April of the present year there was a fall in the tea duty, and, as might naturally be expected, there was a desire among parties engaged in the tea trade to release a considerable quantity of the article at as early an hour as possible on the 6th of April. The practice of the Custom House officers in such cases is to receive the duty on the day preceding that on which the tax on an article of which a large quantity is to be released is to be reduced, and the consequence was, in the instance to which I am now referring, that no less a sum than 233,000*l.*, as well as I can recollect, which were entirely due to the revenue of the second quarter of the present year for goods taken out on the 6th of April, went to the revenue of the first quarter of the year, because it had been received on the afternoon of the preceding day. And let it not be said that this money was really due to the revenue of the first quarter of the year, on the ground that the tea trade had remained stagnant throughout that first quarter in expectation of a remission of the duty. That latter statement is, no doubt, perfectly true; but it is also true that there was a precisely similar stagnation, or rather a much greater stagnation in 1853, prolonged from December, 1852, till May, 1853; and thus 233,000*l.* more were due to the second quarter of 1854. These two items will reduce the apparent deficiency of 570,000*l.* in the revenue of the last quarter by a sum of 373,000*l.* There is another point in reference to the last quarterly statement of revenue to which I must now beg to direct the attention of the House. That statement referred to England and Scotland only, and did not include Ireland. If it had included Ireland, and if it had given us the revenue of the United Kingdom, which is, of course, what we have to deal with, and not the revenue of England and Scotland only, in attempting to arrive at any complete and accurate conclusion upon this subject, you would have found an addition to the apparent revenue of the last quarter, which would have disposed of all the remaining portion of the deficiency of 570,000*l.* which it exhibited; so that, in point of fact, although we are comparing the revenue of a period of war with the revenue of a period of peace, although we are comparing the revenue of a period of dear money with the revenue of a period of cheap money, and although we are comparing the revenue of a period of dear bread with the revenue of a period of cheap bread, yet the revenue of the second quarter of the present year, derived from permanent sources, and fairly estimated, equals that of the corresponding quarter of last year, notwithstanding the great reductions of taxation that had in the interval come into operation. Now, I say that that is a satisfactory statement. With regard to the state of the demands on us, I do not think it would be desirable, and I do not suppose the hon. Baronet could expect, that I should repeat the figures which I laid in great detail before the House at an earlier period of the Session. I must, however, correct the hon. Baronet when he says that I undertook at the commencement of the Session to lay down the principle that the cost of the war during the year should be paid out of the taxes of the year. On the contrary, I am sure the hon. Baronet, and, indeed, his speech contained the avowal, must be aware that I always pointed out to the House that it would be impossible to raise the new taxes within the year, and that, therefore, a temporary advance, which should, of course, be borrowed in some form or another, would be absolutely necessary for the present year. What has the House done? It has provided us with taxing powers which, when added to the available surplus of revenue, will realise a sum equal to the expenses of the war as they have been estimated for the year; and the money that is to accrue from the taxes laid on in the present year, when it shall have been received, will, I have no doubt, be fully equal to the amount of those expenses, and will, if by any good fortune we should, on the 6th April next, have a peace, be sufficient to enable us completely to liquidate these expenses up to that date without adding a shilling to the national debt. I make that statement as far as we have gone at present, without at all attempting what it could never be safe to attempt—without at all attempting to prophecy for the future. All that I venture to state is that none of the appearances presented to us on the 8th of May have as yet been falsified, or in any way rendered less encouraging on the 8th of August. The total addition to the expenditure between the 5th of April and the 29th of July in the present year, which is about sixteen weeks, as compared with the expenditure of the corresponding period of 1853, is about 3,500,000*l.*, and these figures give me reason to suppose, as far as they go, that there will not be at any rate that extravagant departure from our Estimates which undoubtedly in former wars the House had the most serious reason to lament. But, at the same time, I cannot speak with confidence on the matter, for confidence in such a case would undoubtedly be presumption. The provision made by the House, not only with respect to the taxes, of which a large portion cannot be available before the 5th of April next, but also with respect to the money for the purpose of meeting the immediate necessities of the war, has been liberal and ample; and I think it quite possible that I may not even be compelled to use it to the full amount. Speaking from memory, and in round numbers, I may state the case thus. 4,000,000*l.* of Exchequer bonds have been negotiated, and 3,000,000*l.* of that sum have been received. There is an unexhausted power of issuing Exchequer bills still remaining to the amount of about 600,000*l.* or 700,000*l.*, and the amount of Exchequer bills in the market is lower than usual, being, I believe, only about 16,500,000*l.* As respects the balances of the public money, I consider they are in a satisfactory state, and I have not the least expectation of my being under the necessity of calling on the Bank for the use of any funds which are properly its own. The balances in the Exchequer, which were only about 2,000,000*l.* on the 6th of April, rose on the 5th of July to 3,610,000*l.*; and on the 10th of October I expect that they will amount to about 4,500,000*l.* I do not, therefore, think it will be necessary for us to take any special measures, as far as I can judge, with a view to increase the balances in the Exchequer. And now, without troubling the House further with details of finance which have been already laid before them with the utmost completeness, I think I must be content with furnishing the information I have just afforded upon that subject. The hon. Baronet has alluded in the course of his observations to the claim of the East India Company for a sum of about 800,000*l*. That claim was a legacy bequeathed to us by a former Government. It was long a subject of controversy, and it was highly desirable, and propriety required that it should be brought to some conclusion; and, indeed, the East India Company were as anxious for its settlement as we were ourselves. It is perfectly true that the East India Company made a claim of that kind. That claim has been, however, I am bound to say, deliberately disallowed by us; and, I believe, that is a decision in the justice of which this House will acquiesce. But, at the same time, as my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir J. W. Hogg) has given notice of his intention to bring the case under the notice of the House at an early period in the next Session, I do not think that I ought to forestall its decision, or to enter into any explanation of the grounds on which the Government have proceeded in disallowing the claim. I now come to the second question opened by the hon. Baronet with respect to what he termed the sale of stock belonging to the savings banks, and the purchase of Exchequer bills with the proceeds of that sale. There is here an old quarrel between the hon. Baronet and myself, which I am afraid we can never settle. He insists on calling the stock held by the Commissioners of the National Debt the stock of the savings banks. But I believe it is no more the stock of the savings banks than any stock which may happen to belong to him or to any other Member of this House. The savings banks have nothing to do with it. If that stock were increased two-fold the savings banks would not be a penny the richer, and if every farthing of it were pitched into the bottom of the sea the savings banks would not be a penny the poorer. It is a stock not standing to the credit of the savings banks, as the hon. Baronet supposes, but standing to the credit of the National Debt Commissioners, and being in law their property, and theirs only. That which stands to the credit of the savings banks is only a certain sum of money, and not a stock in the books of the National Debt Commissioners, that sum representing the actual receipts of the Commissioners from the savings bank depositors, with the interest credited to their account. That is the property of the savings banks and nothing else whatever. It has no connection except in the imagination of some hon. Gentlemen in this House, and elsewhere perhaps, with the position of the savings banks. But at the same time that stock is the fund placed by Parliament in the hands of the National Debt Commissioners, in order to enable them to meet the calls upon them. It is not in the power of the National Debt Commissioners to control those calls; for they are calls which must be met absolutely. What is the state of the case? Why, the state of the case is, that, generally speaking, when money is cheap, and when the price of the funds is high, the labouring classes save a good deal of money, and the deposits in the savings banks become much larger than the outgoings; considerable sums are then sent up to the Commissioners for the National Debt, which it is their duty to invest in the public securities, and which very frequently, no doubt, they do invest at high prices. At other periods you have money dear, and the pressure on the labouring classes, or, as at present, not so much the pressure on the labouring classes, as the demand for emigration, necessitate the withdrawal of a good deal of money from the savings banks. The same result is produced by the popularity of the building societies, and other modes of investing money; and large demands are then made on the National Debt Commissioners. This year happens to be one in which the calls made on them have been very considerable, and have very greatly exceeded the sums they have received. The hon. Baronet says that I sold out 500,000*l*. or 600,000*l*. worth of stock, at prices varying from 91 to 94, whereas at former periods large quantities of stock have been bought at a much higher price; and he says that that is a very improvident proceeding. Why, Sir, there never was a more gross non sequitur. What I had to consider was, not the price at which they were bought, but the possible terms on which I could provide for the calls made on the savings banks and consequently upon the National Debt Commissioners. Suppose every farthing of the stock had been purchased at par; suppose the price of the stock was 90, and suppose that I had foreseen with certainty that the price of stock must fall and that the drain would continue, of course it would have been my duty to sell at 90 rather than wait until the funds should fall to 85, and that is the principle on which I acted this year. I am happy to say that the tide seems now to be turning, and that the drain has of late become greatly diminished. But having seen that heavy drain going on, it was my duty to provide for it, and the question for me to consider was, whether the price of stock was such as to make it my interest to take the opportunity of making that provision at the present time, or to wait and take my chance of the harvest, of the war, and of the state of the money market. I certainly thought that we had a few weeks ago an extraordinary high price of the funds. There is no doubt about that; it was observed by everybody. We had the funds running up from 91, to 92, 93, and 94, during a period of war, and with the rate of discount at $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. That was a state of things little less than marvellous, and it was one which I could not expect would continue. Having this drain going on to the extent of 30,000*l.* or 40,000*l.* a week, it was my duty—and I think the proceeding was a provident one—to avail myself of the state of the money market, and to raise money by the sale of stock, and that was the course which I pursued. I was very glad, therefore, that the hon. Baronet mentioned the circumstance, for I consider it a provident proceeding on my part to have taken advantage of that state of the money market, and to have realised some of the money at the high prices then prevailing, rather than sell from week to week, with the certainty of stock being lower. I thought it was wise and expedient to replenish the balance which I held at the time, as I found I could do so with great advantage to the public. But the hon. Baronet says that I not only sold savings bank stock, but that I purchased with the proceeds Exchequer bills. There is a little mistake of the hon. Baronet in that statement, because the bills which I purchased were not Exchequer bills, but Consolidated Fund bills, which are securities of a different character. The latter securities are, in point of fact, deficiency bills, payable at par on quarter day. The taking up of these Consolidated Fund bills was a very simple operation. They amounted to 500,000*l.*, and if I had not taken them up through the National Debt Commissioners I should have paid interest on them to the Bank at the rate of 2*d.* per day, or 3*l.* 8*s.* per cent per annum. I believe that the measure I have adopted was a much better one than buying Exchequer bills. If I purchased bills in order to meet the drain on the savings banks, I must have afterwards gone to the money market and sold them—an operation which would have been very inconvenient, and which would have tended to disturb and depress that market. The hon. Baronet need not entertain any apprehension that in respect of these bills there is the slightest intention to create a new stock. I entirely demur to the doctrine of the hon. Baronet that the consolidation of Exchequer bills last year was a creation of a new debt; it was merely a funding of Exchequer bills. But, at the same time, this is a transaction of an entirely different character, and these bills have no connection with the creation of a new stock. I informed the hon. Baronet, at the commencement of the Session, in reply to a question which he addressed to me, that there was no intention of creating any new stock—that it was impossible to give any pledge upon such a subject, or to foresee what the public interest might require; but that, as far as the Government could then see, they had no such intention. This is a simple fact. It has had nothing to do with the creation of a new stock; it is an economical arrangement, and one which I am sure will meet with the approval of the House. That is all the information I have now to give upon the subject; and I hope I have fully answered the questions of the hon. Baronet.

MR. WILKINSON said, it appeared to him that the Government were placed in a very disadvantageous position by an arrangement which compelled them to purchase in the market when stock was high, and to sell stock when it was low. In his opinion some much better arrangement might be adopted, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would direct his attention to the improvement of the present system.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have been endeavouring to make a thorough investigation of the matter, in order to see how the system has worked. I have lately had a statement prepared, but which is not quite completed, from which it appears that the average price of all the purchases in the Three per Cent Stock by the National Debt Commissioners is 91 1-16*th*, and that the average price of all their sales in the same stock has been 87 $\frac{3}{4}$, and therefore so far as the principal operation of the National Debt Commissioners is concerned, their sales have realised less than their purchases by the difference between 87½ and 91 1-16th. But in another description of stock, namely—the Three-and-a-half per Cents—they have bought at 95 13-16ths and sold at 96½, thereby realising a profit, although not a very considerable one. I shall direct my earnest attention to the subject, with a view to devise some improvement of the practice which has hitherto prevailed.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he had not made the mistake imputed to him by the right hon. Gentleman of confounding money with stock. What he wished to hear from the right hon. Gentleman was, a denial that the savings banks money, which he believed to be a sacred trust, had ever been used for State purposes, or to sustain the Exchequer-bill market.

MR. HUME said, that he had some years since laid Resolutions on the table of the House, showing, that up to that period there had been a loss of nearly 3,000,000*l.* to the country, and it had now, he believed, reached to very nearly 5,000,000*l.* He had endeavoured year after year to prevent this waste of public money, but his efforts had been futile. He trusted, however, that the Government would see the necessity of remedying so glaring an evil. He hoped that the result of the discussion would tend to cause inquiry into the causes of loss sustained by the public. At present one source of loss arose from greater interest being paid than the average rate of interest, and losses also arose from other causes.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I wish to remind the hon. Member for Montrose that I have introduced a Bill on the subject of the interest paid by savings banks, but that it has been impossible to proceed with it during the present Session. I must, however, protest against the doctrine that the savings-banks money is trust money; it is no more trust money than money in the till of a private banker.

INNUMBERED ESTATES (WEST INDIES) BILL.

Order for Third Reading read.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he wished to say a few words on the subject of a gentleman who was the chairman of the Exchequer Loan Commission, Mr. Benjamin Harrison, who had, without honour or remuneration, devoted his services to the benefit of the public, and who had established a strong claim upon the gratitude of the country. He did not think that there was any other country in the world where cases could be found of gentlemen of information, of experience, and of substance, who were willing to give their services for no reward at all. Happily, in this country such cases were frequent, but he thought that the House would feel that it was right that such instances should be held up for public approval, in order that the approbation of a body of gentlemen like the British House of Commons might operate as a reward to those persons who had rendered such services to the State, and might at the same time encourage others to come forward and render similar benefits to their country.

MR. HUME said, he rose to express his concurrence in what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman with regard to Mr. Harrison.

MR. J. WILSON broughts up the report on the Resolutions.

MR. HUME said that, as last night the hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald) accused the East India Company of acting partially against the Queen's officers, he wished to observe that the Queen's officers experienced no injustice, and that up to the present moment it was the Company's officers who had to complain that the higher commands were not given to them. A Queen's officer, Lieutenant General Anson, had just been promoted over the heads of eighty-two Indian lieutenant generals to command the troops at Madras. With reference to his observations on Lord Dalhousie, he wished to explain that, in speaking yesterday, while he condemned one part of his Lordship's conduct, he also took occasion to do the noble Lord justice as an executive officer, being of opinion that, in many respects, his services were above all praise.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he would admit that, as regarded the higher commands, appointments were given to officers in the Queen's service to the exclusion of officers in the Company's service; but what he desired to call attention to was, the absolute exclusion from general staff appointments of Queen's officers.

MONUMENT TO THOMAS CAMPBELL
THE POET.

LORD CAMPBELL wished to put to the noble Earl at the head of Her Majesty's Government a question of which he had given him notice. He mentioned the subject he was about to bring under their Lordships' attention at the request of the executors of one of the greatest of our poets — Thomas Campbell. He (Lord Campbell) was present when the remains of that distinguished man were deposited in Westminster Abbey, and he saw on that occasion the Earl of Aberdeen, the late Sir Robert Peel, Lord John Russell, and many of the most illustrious characters in this country, assembled to do homage to the genius and virtue of the departed poet. It was a matter of satisfaction to all who felt an interest in the honour of the country, that the remains of Thomas Campbell were deposited in Westminster Abbey, and it was agreed that a subscription should be made with the view of erecting a monument to his memory in Poets' Corner, amid the memorials of men who had done so much honour to English literature, and a statue had been accordingly completed by an eminent sculptor. The subscribers included persons of all ranks, from the Queen to the humblest individuals in the kingdom. But, of course, before the statue could be erected, it was necessary to obtain the permission of the Dean and Chapter of Westminster. The Dean and Chapter made no objection, and could make no objection, to any of the writings of the deceased. They knew him to have been a sincere Christian; they knew that he was not only the poet of liberty but of order, and that all his writings tended to promote the cause of morality and religion. Thomas Campbell was also the author of poems which not only celebrated the naval glories of England, but which would perpetuate those glories. Although, however, the Dean and Chapter offered no objection to the erection of a statue, they made a pecuniary demand. The executors of the deceased had paid a sum of 73*l.* 5*s.* 2*d.* for the grave, and they paid a further sum of 7*l.* 7*s.* for leave to put the name of the poet upon the stone that covered the tomb. But now the Dean and Chapter further demanded 210*l.* for two square feet of ground to be occupied by the pedestal of the statue. The subscription that had been raised for providing the statue was exhausted, although very moderate compensation had been given to the distinguished artist by whom the statue was executed. There were, therefore, no means of paying the demand made by the Dean and Chapter. A representation had been made to them upon the subject, but they were relentless; they said they must have the 200 guineas, or the statue should never enter Westminster Abbey. The statue had consequently remained for five years in the studio of the artist, having been excluded from that national temple for which it was destined. He should have thought that the Dean and Chapter would have waived their claim in order to do honour to the memory of so distinguished a poet; but although repeated representations had been made to them they still persisted in their demand. The Dean and Chapter received grants from the public funds for the repairs of the Abbey, and they had therefore no right to act as if the edifice were the mere private property of the corporation, instead of being national property. The Dean and Chapter could not say in one breath that the Abbey was the national Pantheon, while in another they maintained that it was their private property. He thought their Lordships would agree that this was a state of things which should not continue to exist. He was convinced that the noble Earl (the Earl of Aberdeen) took as lively an interest in everything that concerned the honour of the country as could be felt by any individual, and that he would be most anxious that this reproach should be wiped away. He (Lord Campbell) begged, therefore, to ask the noble Earl whether he was prepared, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, to make a representation to the Dean and Chapter in order that the statue might be erected without payment of this exorbitant demand; and whether, if the Dean and Chapter persisted in that demand, the noble Earl would, in the next Session of Parliament, propose a grant of 200 guineas from the public money for the purpose of purchasing a site for the statue?

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN said, his noble and learned Friend had put to him a question which he confessed he was not quite prepared to answer. He sympathised entirely in the admiration expressed by the noble and learned Lord for the distinguished person to whom he had referred. The noble and learned Lord had reminded him that he had attended the remains of that distinguished person to the grave, and he had also contributed to the erection of a memorial to him. Now, although the demand of the Dean and Chapter for the erection of a statue might appear immoderate, he must inform his noble and learned Friend that such charges were, to a certain degree, indispensable, in order to enable the Dean and Chapter to maintain the fabric of the noble edifice of which they had charge. The Dean and Chapter possessed no estates from which they could provide for the repairs of the Abbey, and there were no funds available for that purpose, as was generally the case with respect to almost every cathedral church. The Dean and Chapter had no funds for effecting those repairs beyond their receipts for places of burial and for the erection of monuments, and the special grants which they occasionally received from Parliament. He (the Earl of Aberdeen) was quite ready to admit that this was a state of things the continuance of which was not desirable, but he would submit to his noble and learned Friend, whether, instead of proposing a grant from the public money for purchasing a site, the simplest mode of meeting the difficulty would not be for the noble and learned Lord and himself (the Earl of Aberdeen), with other admirers of the distinguished poet, to subscribe to provide the amount necessary for securing the admission of the monument to Westminster Abbey? For his own part, he would be very glad to contribute to such a fund, and he was satisfied that the sum of 200 guineas would readily be provided. There was no doubt that Thomas Campbell was well worthy of a monument in Westminster Abbey; but, from their want of funds the Dean and Chapter had been obliged to allow the erection of numerous monuments in Westminster Abbey to persons who were not entitled to such a distinction. In doing so, they had disfigured, to a great extent, a building which was, in his humble opinion, by far the finest Gothic edifice in England. He regretted the manner in which the Abbey had been disfigured by the erection of monuments which could not be said to have the slightest claim to admission to such an edifice. He must say, however, that not a single farthing of the sum derived from this source found its way into the pockets of the Dean and Chapter, who had no personal interest whatever in the matter. The Dean and Chapter were bound to maintain the fabric of the Abbey, and this was the only mode by which they could obtain the funds necessary for that purpose. He knew, from his own experience, that the Dean and Chapter had acted with great liberality in cases similar to that to which his noble and learned Friend had called attention. Many years ago he had to make arrangements for the erection of a monument in Westminster Abbey to a distinguished individual, and on that occasion the Dean remitted the payment to which he and the Chapter would have been entitled. The amount demanded for the admission of monuments depended on the extent of the repairs which it might be necessary, from time to time, to make, and it varied according to the exigencies of the Dean and Chapter. The sum demanded in this instance appeared to be a large one, but, no doubt, the circumstances of the Dean and Chapter rendered such a charge necessary. Although he considered Thomas Campbell worthy of all honour, he was not prepared to hold out hopes that a grant would be proposed from the public funds to purchase a site for the poet's statue in Westminster Abbey. At the same time, he would endeavour, by the best means in his power, to take such steps as appeared to him most likely to secure the admission of the statue into that edifice.

LORD CAMPBELL expressed himself satisfied with the statement of the noble Earl, but thought some means should be provided for keeping Westminster Abbey in repair, without making these heavy demands for the erection of monuments to distinguished persons.

EARL GRANVILLE moved—

"That as regards the Mayo County Advances Bill, as the Provisions of the said Bill relate solely to Money Arrangements between the Exchequer and the County of Mayo, it partakes of the Character of a Bill of Aid or Supply, as it secures the Payment of money due to the Exchequer now in dispute; and inasmuch as the passing of the same will prevent Litigation, and the Settlement therein provided was not agreed upon till lately, whereby the Introduction of the Bill into the House of Commons was delayed to the 1st of August, it is reasonable that the same be allowed to be read a Second Time this Day, if the House shall think fit so to order."

LORD REDESDALE should not object to the adoption of this Resolution, but felt bound to declare his belief that adherence to the Resolutions of May last against considering Bills sent up after the 25th of July, would produce the most beneficial effects in the acceleration of the public business.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN must express his hope that the Resolution of May last would not be too strictly and rigidly applied, as otherwise there was not much likelihood of its being maintained.

SECOND COMMON LAW PROCEDURE, 1854, BILL.

Commons' Amendments considered (according to Order).

THE LORD CHANCELLOR moved that their Lordships do agree to the Commons' Amendments on this Bill, with some modifications. Most of these related to the arbitration clause; but there was one subject as to which a substantial alteration had been made in the measure, which no doubt the other House considered an amendment, but in which he could not concur; at the same time, he did not think it wise to raise any discussion on the subject, and so endanger the passing of what was otherwise a very useful and important Bill. As the measure was sent down to the House of Commons, it contained a clause providing that whereas, by the law as it at present stood, juries must be unanimous, or, if not, must be kept together until they were, in future they should be kept together only twelve hours, and during that time they might, under the direction of the Judge, be supplied with reasonable nourishment, the object being to secure a proper amount of deliberation, with a view to bring the jury to a unanimous decision; but if at the end of that period they should not be unanimous, then the verdict of ten or eleven, if so many should agree, should be taken as that of the whole. That provision had been introduced on the suggestion of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Brougham), and he confessed its great superiority to the recommendation of the Commissioners—namely, the simple discharge of the jury at the end of twelve hours if they did not agree before; because, supposing such a course had been adopted, it would have been in the power of one or two obstinate men on the jury to have prevented a verdict being obtained, by simply holding out for twelve hours. The suggestion was therefore agreed to by their Lordships, and the Bill went down to the House of Commons in that state; but in the Amendments made there, half of that clause had been struck out, and the very provision objected to by their Lordships, for the discharge of the jury after twelve hours' fruitless deliberation, introduced. Inasmuch, therefore, as their Lordships had refused to adopt such a principle at an earlier period of the Session, when they had ample opportunity to consider the matter, he did not think they could adopt it now. What he should propose was, to agree to the Commons' Amendments, and further amend the Bill by striking out the whole of the clause in question, thus leaving the law in respect to the unanimity of juries in the state it was before. He had the less scruple in recommending that course, inasmuch as the Commons had already struck out three clauses relating to the jury system, and it would, therefore, be absolutely necessary that the whole subject should be considered early next Session. In the manner in which the Bill had been sent up, it became simply inoperative, and there was no sense in the following clause, the 18th, which related to that part of the 17th clause that was struck out; the 18th might, therefore, now be dispensed with, as well as what remained of the former one.

LORD CAMPBELL heartily congratulated the House that, after the serious disappointments they had met with during the present Session, they had now almost a certain prospect that one of the most important Bills for the improvement of the law that had ever been proposed would receive the Royal assent. The Amendments made by the Commons by no means vitally affected the principle of the Bill, and they would be enabled by very slight sacrifices to obtain the reform they wanted. In his opinion, if this Bill passed, it would redeem the Session from the imputation of having been a fruitless one. He believed that since the time of Edward I. so important a measure of legal reform as the present had not been introduced. The only one of the Amendments from which he should be disposed seriously to differ was that regarding the unanimity of juries, which was much too large a question to be now discussed. With respect to the additional Amendment proposed, he concurred most heartily in it, and he had every reason to believe that it would meet with approbation elsewhere, because, as the Bill now stood, it might have the most injurious effect, inasmuch as a wrong-headed man or a friend to either party might, by sitting twelve hours, prevent an adverse verdict, and thus not only would the time of the Court be wasted, but a most unprofitable expenditure would take place. If such a principle were admitted into civil trials, attempts would be made to extend it to criminal proceedings, and their Lordships might be very well assured that, if in trials for murder juries could obtain their discharge by refusing to give a verdict after twelve hours' deliberation, there never would be a conviction, and it would virtually amount to the abolition of the punishment of death altogether. They must be very cautious, therefore, what principles they introduced into the administration of the law with regard to civil trials, as by their transference to criminal trials they might give rise to the most injurious consequences. He should be glad if it were no longer requisite that the jury should be unanimous in delivering their verdict; but as the House of Commons refused to assent to any relaxation of the law on this point, he thought it was necessary to retain the present compulsory means of securing unanimity. In the present instance, he quite concurred with his noble and learned Friend on the woolsack, that it would be better to leave the law in that particular as it stood, and therefore the only course which could be pursued was that which had been suggested.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE regretted that a proposal so reasonable in itself, so calculated to increase the efficiency of trial by jury, and to secure additional respect for it, as that of allowing the verdict of ten or eleven jurors to be taken as that of the whole, in case they did not agree after a certain time, should not have received the assent of the House of Commons during the present Session. He was, however, sure that when the attention of the public had been called to it, it would eventually be adopted.

Commons' Amendments agreed to, with

CONSOLIDATED FUND (APPROPRIATION) BILL,

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.

LORD MONTEAGLE said, he took the opportunity of renewing the question which he had put to the Government in the month of June last, but which was not answered then for reasons in which he quite concurred. It related to an important matter. In April last, it was generally understood, and admitted by the highest authority in the other House, that a difference of opinion existed on an important question of finance between the Government and the Bank of England. Those differences between the Treasury and the Bank did not concern them alone, but were important with reference to the monetary concerns of the country generally; and therefore, as it was admitted that this difference did exist, and that the opinion of the law officers of the Crown was to be taken, he, on the 2nd of June, put a question to the noble Earl (Earl Granville) on the subject, and called for copies of all correspondence which had taken place between the Government and the Bank in 1854, respecting the advances required on deficiency bills, and the state of the public balances. On that occasion, the noble Earl admitted that there was a question pending, and that a controversy was going on, but that in the then state of the transactions it was inexpedient to give the information asked for. Two months had elapsed since that reply, and Parliament was about to separate under circumstances, which—though he rejoiced that the Bill now under consideration afforded the strongest evidence of the unexampled liberality of Parliament in the support of the Crown, and implied also a mark of confidence in the Government—yet were circumstances of such complication in regard to our monetary affairs, as to render it necessary that it should be known whether or not the differences between the Government and the Bank were at an end; and whether the Government could, either by replying to his question, or by laying papers on the table of the House, put the country in possession of the whole matter. The present Bill was one of unexampled importance. At no period of our history was Parliament ever called on to give greater proofs of its desire to support the Government in a war. There were in this Bill 4,000,000*l.* or 5,000,000*l.* appropriated, of which 3,000,000*l.* was placed at the unreserved disposal of the Government, and 5,000,000*l.* or 6,000,000*l.* had been by recent legislation added to the financial business of the Treasury; besides causing a great amount of additional business in the House of Commons. He was glad to see that the ordinary powers of an Appropriation Act were in full force with regard to those new sums so to be dealt with, and that it was rendered penal to put any of those new sums to any other use than that to which they were appropriated, and that these 5,000,000*l.* or 6,000,000*l.* were still subject to the control and appropriation, which was applicable to all other sums. He would conclude by repeating the question whether the Government was now in a position to lay before Parliament and the country the result of the transactions with regard to loans between the Treasury and the Bank, whether the Treasury and the Bank had come to an understanding on that subject, and what that understanding was?

EARL GRANVILLE said, he thought his noble Friend was pretty nearly correct in his statement of what had occurred in June last. He (Earl Granville) then said, that there had been a correspondence between the Chancellor of the Exchequer—not the Treasury—and the Bank; that it was to a certain degree of a private nature, and was not recorded at the Treasury, and that it was of a kind which it was not usual to produce to Parliament; that the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Bank had had some difference of opinion, the subject of which had been referred to the law officers of the Crown. He was afraid he could give his noble Friend no other answer now. The matter had been considered by the law officers of the Crown, but, owing to the great pressure of Parliamentary business, they had not yet sent in their opinions. At the same time he should be happy to give his noble Friend, as early as possible, information as to what that opinion was.

LORD MONTEAGLE hoped that the result would be communicated to the public. He again urged that the correspondence might be produced.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that no correspondence of this nature was ever produced.

On Question, agreed to.

CONVENTION BETWEEN AUSTRIA AND THE SUBLIME PORTE.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE: My Lords, I now rise, in pursuance of the notice which I have laid on your Lordships' table, to make some observations upon the progress and state of the war in which this country is unhappily engaged, and also to endeavour to obtain from my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs some further information than has yet been given to Parliament in regard to the alliances or confederacies in which we are directly or indirectly engaged. I am not going to take any retrospect of the operations of the war, or to complain that the expectations which have been entertained by unreasonable or other persons have not been fulfilled by anything done by our fleets or armies. But, before making any observations at all, I wish to notice very shortly the attacks which have been made, partly in and partly out of Parliament, on those who have thought it right from time to time to utter their opinions upon the conduct of the war; be it with respect to the operations that are conducted by our commanders abroad, or be it with respect to the mode in which the Ministry at home have employed the resources of the country for the purposes of the war. I and others have been accused of personal, interested, and ignoble motives and feelings in thus expressing our opinions. Of that, however, I take no account. Every man who takes part in public life, or public strife, must make up his mind to this kind of attack, to which the very best men, from the earliest times to the present day, have been exposed. But what I complain of is, that it should be supposed that persons who make such observations and criticisms as he had expressed in his place in Parliament are less zealous in the cause of their country, and less inclined to act with patriotism, and to assist, as far as they can, in the struggle in which this country is now engaged, than others who, it may be blindly, or it may be zealously, support all the measures either of our commanders abroad or of the Government at home. That, however, is a course neither consistent with reason nor common sense. It has been, and is, not only the privilege but the duty of Members of either House of Parliament to express their opinions either upon the operations of our commanders abroad or upon the measures of the Ministers at home, if they think them deserving of notice. That principle had been acted upon in the best Parliamentary times. I will not refer to the many cases and authorities under which I might shelter myself and others who have taken the same part; I will only refer to one case which occurred in the last war in which this country was engaged. No one will imagine that Mr. Pitt was wanting in fervour, earnestness, and sincerity in his support of the Crown and of the cause of his country when engaged in war against the French Republic, when the resources of that great people (now happily in alliance with us) were directed against us by the energy of Napoleon Bonaparte. What was the conduct of Mr. Pitt when the war, of which he approved and the justice of which he vindicated, broke out under the Addington Administration in 1803? He did not hesitate to take exception to the two first measures which the Government introduced into Parliament. The first was the Militia Bill, for providing for the defence of the country; the second was the Income Tax Bill, by which supplies were raised to meet the exigencies of the public service. With regard to the last, Mr. Pitt even moved a Resolution as an Amendment, and divided the House upon it; and, although he was beaten, his influence was so great that the Bill was somewhat altered. And yet, when during the present Parliament we have had some persons who ventured to criticise or oppose similar measures, or rather particular details of them, they have been charged in Parliament with being inclined to withhold the proper supplies for the war, and out of doors language equally strong, or rather much stronger, has been applied to them. Leaving that subject, however, there are two or three points on which I wish to make a few observations before I come to the principal subject of my Motion. The first is with regard to the new organisation of the Ministry of War. Undoubtedly, up to the present time Parliament has not had laid before it sufficient information—which I hope will be communicated at the earliest period of next Session—to enable us to understand the departmental changes that have been effected. We know that the noble Duke the Secretary of War (the Duke of Newcastle) has been relieved from the charge of the administration of the Colonies. But what are his new functions, what new powers he possesses, what new duties he discharges, what establishment he administers, we know not, save and except that we have heard it intimated that the Commissariat Department has been transferred to him. That is an intimation which I have heard with great satisfaction. I think nothing can be more absurd than that the Commissariat Department, on which the Army abroad is dependent for its supply of food, should be placed under the Financial Secretary of the Treasury. Those who know the multifarious duties that are said to devolve upon that Gentleman will feel that it is utterly impossible for him, even if he were otherwise qualified for the duty, to superintend the Commissariat of an army serving abroad. The duties of the Commissariat are, however, certainly divisible into two heads. There is, first, that which may be called more especially the military duty, of providing provisions and stores for an army during a campaign, or for troops stationed in different parts of the country at home; and there is also the task of providing for the payment of the matters so required, and of supervising the bills which may be drawn upon the Treasury. This is a totally different sort of business, and may be called the banking business of the Commissariat, and is one that, perhaps, ought to be divided from the military business. There can be no doubt that the transfer of the duties of the Commissariat from the Treasury to the Minister of War is a very good step, and I trust that when Parliament next meets we may have a clear explanation of the new organisation of the War Department, and that it may be arranged in such a manner as to secure additional facility and economy in the transaction of business, and increased responsibility, which at present is greatly divided. This is, I know, a very difficult and important question; and, unfortunately, it was not considered as soon as it should have been, because, although our operations were more or less begun before we declared war—that is, in February or March last—it was not until May that the public were aware that any change was resolved upon in the organisation of the military department. I wish now to state my regret that the blockades of the Russians which have been established have certainly not proved so effective in injuring the trade and commerce of the enemy as we might have hoped from the great armaments that we have sent out. I never received any answer to the question why the blockade of Archangel and the other ports of the White Sea was not entered upon until the 1st of August. It is certainly notorious that great part of the commerce of Russia came through those ports during the past year. The blockade in the Baltic, though rather late in being established, was, no doubt, not without effect. I believe that, by the operations of our fleets in that sea, we have entirely stopped the revenue which would otherwise have been derived to the Imperial treasury from the customs duties levied in the ports of Russia on that sea, and this is no slight advantage. But I believe that, although the trade of the enemy by that sea has been stopped up, we have, unfortunately, left facilities for its being carried on in other channels; so that, although you have somewhat affected the finances of the Imperial treasury by your blockade, you have not injuriously affected the inhabitants of the country, and your operations have not, therefore, been sensibly felt through the country. That is a fact which no despatches can contradict; for it is proved by the circumstance that the value of Russian produce, either in our markets or in those of other countries, is not sensibly higher than it was in February last. The prices that then prevailed were not, I admit, peace prices; but still, if the price has not risen sensibly since—for I admit that on some articles it may have risen as much as 5, and on one as much as 8 per cent—it shows that the supply has not been short, and that the measures taken to stop the supply have not been so effectual as might be desired. It is, indeed, within my knowledge that articles of produce from the Black Sea were at lower prices in the London market last week than they were two months ago; and that a contract was entered into not a fortnight ago for a supply of linseed direct from the Sea of Azoff, at a lower rate than that article was sold at two months ago. It is, therefore, clear—whatever despatches may be sent home by admirals or captains—that there is not an effectual blockade in the Black Sea. I have dwelt on this in order to enforce greater watchfulness in this respect in future years, if the war unfortunately continues; and, as far as I can see, there is no possible end to the war until you bring the pressure of that war, and of the losses that it must occasion, to bear upon the mass of the people of Russia. It is a mistake to think that there is no public opinion in that country that is really very much dreaded by the Government. Public opinion, it is true, does not act often or easily in that country, but when it does, it acts in such a manner that the Government are obliged to heed it. I must notice another topic on which I think there has been remissness on the part of the Government. I allude to the question much mooted by authorities of great weight on the point—the supply of gunboats to our fleets. It is really no answer to say that an unprofessional man, even backed by professional authorities, can know nothing at all on this point, because there are certain facts so patent to common sense that any person possessed of a fair share of that endowment may judge of them even without professional qualifications. Now, two facts have never been denied—the one, that neither of our fleets is supplied with steam gunboats, by which I mean vessels drawing from four to five feet of water, and carrying heavy armaments; and the other, that if the fleets, and particularly that in the Baltic, were supplied with such vessels, they would be eminently useful. Let me call the attention of your Lordships to what happened the other day in the course of a reconnaissance before Bomarsund—where I hope our forces are now triumphant—by a squadron of Her Majesty's vessels. This circumstance I state on authority which, I venture to assert, is perfectly indisputable. The squadron that reconnoitred Bomarsund consisted of four screw vessels of 60 guns each, and the Amphion and Valorous steamers. At five in the morning the vessels weighed and stood in for Bomarsund to reconnoitre. At a quarter past six o'clock the Valorous signalled that she was aground, and the other ships were ordered to assist her. She, however, remained aground for two or three hours. Now, it was clear that if there had been vessels of small draught to take soundings, this accident would not have happened. Then, again, if there had been vessels of slight draught, which would yet be sufficient to carry guns of large calibre, such as mortars, it would have been very easy to direct some shell practice against that fort. It is true there are long guns, but those long guns cannot, it is stated by persons having a knowledge of the subject, be pointed above twenty degrees, while on board ship, and will not carry above 2,500 yards; but mortars would have carried shells a distance of above 5,000 yards. It is a matter of common sense, that in a war in which we carry on a great deal of bombardment, the use of mortars is necessary, and that there should be a sufficiency of heavy guns of long range with which to attack a fort. It was quite possible in such a case to do great damage to the enemy without much endangering ourselves. This system of warfare was tried during the war which preceded the emancipation of Greece, when the forces of Ibrahim Pasha took refuge in the Castle of the Morea, which was shelled by large mortars without losing a single man. Then in a sea abounding with shoal water, having many rivers running into it, with forts fortified, and for many reasons presenting a dangerous passage, vessels with a light draught of water and carrying a heavy armament must be of the greatest possible advantage. "Well, then," it has been said in a taunting manner, "why don't you show us how to build vessels to carry all this armament and draw no water at all?" I know when such a remark is addressed to an unprofessional person of no authority by somebody who has professional knowledge, of course the laugh is turned against the unprofessional person; but when that sort of language is used in the face of notorious facts, it shows, not experience, but ignorance on the part of the person, professional or otherwise, who makes the remark. I say, as a fact that no one can contradict, that there are at this moment, or were a few months ago, not less than five steam-boats running on a river of Upper California, which cannot, from the nature of the river, draw above three or four feet of water, because there is not in dry weather in a part of that river above that depth of water, and yet these boats convey eighty and 100 tons of merchandise, besides persons on deck, and fifty or sixty passengers; they ascend the river at the rate of 10½ miles an hour, and they come down at the rate of about fifteen miles. Why, then, are we told that it is impossible to have boats carrying much less weight, and drawing perhaps a little more water? I am not to be told that those boats are only fit for river navigation—for the Bay of California is 80 miles long and 20 broad, and at certain points there is a tremendously heavy sea; yet these boats navigate that sea in perfect safety. I mention the fact to show that persons who are not professional, when they speak on these matters do not necessarily speak nonsense. The guns sent out in the Vulture the other day weighed only 19 cwt.; and two guns of that description, with all their carriages and fittings, could not weigh above twelve tons; and, even making a pretty good allowance beyond that weight, the difference would still be considerable; for the boats to which he referred carried from eighty to 100 tons, while the armament, he repeated, would only amount to twelve tons. There was produced in the other House of Parliament a letter from the Admiral in command of the Baltic fleet, and an extract was read from it which would be extremely painful if it were thought those extracts gave a fair sample of the whole tenor of it. But I do not believe, and I know the public will not believe, that Admiral Napier wrote home to his Government that the fortresses of the enemy were impregnable, and that even with the fine fleet under his command he was able to do comparatively nothing. The public would rather believe, and I believe, that in those letters Admiral Napier pointed out the particular points in which his fleet was deficient; that he applied for certain additions to that fleet; and that he only mentioned that he was unable to act as he wished because he had not the appliances which he thought it right he should have. I say nothing of what may be the indiscretion of making public any such communication; but I refer to this matter because it justifies me in noticing this subject before your Lordships.

I will now come to what is more immediately the object of the Motion with which I shall conclude, namely, the confederacies and alliances into which this country has entered. I hope my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs will not think me inclined to be too meddling, when I say that in my opinion, before Parliament rises, we ought to have a copy of the treaty to which I alluded on a former occasion—I mean the treaty between Austria and the Porte, which treaty was undoubtedly, I believe, concluded at Constantinople on the 14th of June, under our auspices. It is a notorious matter that the Turkish Government were extremely reluctant to allow an Austrian army to enter the Principalities. It is a matter of fact that has been officially made known to your Lordships, that the Servian Government protested against the occupation of Servia by Austrian troops. You have the document in which that protest was embodied laid upon your Lordships' table. It is an admirable document, and is well worthy of the attention of Parliament. But it is notorious that there were many reasons why the Turkish Government would not be anxious to see the entrance of Austrian troops into the Principalities, however pleased they might be—as all rational people must be—in having the assistance of a great military Power in carrying on the war. But the question is, have they, by that occupation, the assistance of Austria in carrying on the war? That is the information I want to get from my noble Friend. I want to know what are the grounds on which he relies that Austria will co-operate with you, not to advance her own interests, but to secure the objects of the Allied Powers in the war in which they are engaged, when you permit her to take up such an imposing position as will render her the arbiter, so far as the Principalities are concerned, of the fate of Turkey? The treaty was signed on the 14th of June, and up to this hour, I believe, so far as I am informed, no Austrian soldier has come forward to enter the Principalities. I beg clearly to be understood as throwing no blame on Austria whatever. Austria has a perfect right to pursue her own interests. She is a great Power, and has a great object naturally—I hope they are honest objects—she has a perfect right to pursue her policy in the manner she thinks proper and honest. But the question is, what is to be our policy, and how far we were wise in permitting this treaty, and what is the security on which we rely in this matter. In that treaty Austria engages, in the first place, to endeavour by all means in her power to obtain the evacuation of the Danubian Principalities by the Russian forces, and, if necessary, to employ force herself for the attainment of that purpose. Well, as I have said, this treaty was signed on the 14th of June. All that Austria has yet done is that she has made her application to Russia—and she has been somewhat scurvily treated. Austria engages by the treaty also to restore the Principalities to Turkey as soon as a treaty of peace shall be concluded by which the integrity of the Turkish Empire shall be secured. Austria, in conjunction with Prussia, has made the humblest appeal to the Emperor of Russia to withdraw his troops from the Principalities; and even when the application was made on the 3rd of July they did not venture to ask so much as that he should withdraw them at once, but merely asked that he would fix a period beyond which he would not prolong the occupation of the Principalities. I should have expected that when such an appeal came from a great and independent Power like Austria, it would be received with respect; but, instead of receiving anything like respect, the Emperor of Russia would not listen for a moment to any accommodation on these terms. You would have thought, of course, that Austria would then move at once; but she did not move. Why did she not move? Why has she hesitated? Why does she not now move? Her conduct is guided, as I have said, by her own interests; and my firm belief is, that Austria will not move until the Russians move before them, and that you will never get Austria to co-operate with the object which you have declared to have in view in the war you are carrying on. He wished their Lordships to observe that this power of entering the Principalities is given to Austria without any declaration of war on her part against Russia, and I firmly believe she will not allow one of her soldiers to fire a shot in hostility to Russia. She will be in the Principalities with an immense force to interpose between the retreating army and their victors; she will be there in a strong position, maintaining an armed neutrality, and if she please—and it is the very thing she probably will please—an armed intervention. I want to know, my Lords, have we any security against that? I think we must consider not only the objects of Austria, but also her engagements. Is it any triumph of our diplomacy that she now enters and occupies those provinces?—though I am quite free to say that her assistance in that matter will be very valuable if sincerely given, and if we can trust that it will be turned to our advantage;—but is it for our objects or for the objects of Turkey, that the Austrians will enter these provinces? It is no such thing. Those Principalities, about which we have had so much discussion, and which, if not the chief, are the proximate cause of the war, and about which so much bloodshed has taken place, are as much an object of interest to Austria as to Turkey. What I mean to say is, that if the Russians retain possession of these Principalities, the injury to Germany and to the Austrian Empire by the Russians holding possession of that bank of the Danube will be greater than to the Ottoman Empire. The Ottoman Empire would in such an event merely lose a small portion of tribute; but the strength and power which the acquisition of the Principalities would give to Russia over Germany in a military sense, would place the wealth, trade, and commerce of Austria and of Germany at the feet of the Czar. It is for the interest of Austria that Russia should not become possessed of those Principalities; but at the same time Austria could not view with indifference the entrance into them of an army belonging to the Western Powers. I do not wonder, therefore, to hear of the readiness and eagerness of Austria to sign the treaty she has signed, by which she gets possession of the Principalities without involving herself in hostilities with any Power whatever, and thereby obtains a strong position, where she will be able at any time to assume an armed neutrality or intervention, and perhaps even to threaten the position of those who consider themselves her allies. But her objects are not known; the only object that Austria has announced has been the evacuation of the Principalities. She undoubtedly acknowledges—and so, I believe, does Prussia—that as regards the first cause of the war, justice was on the side of Turkey, and the injustice and aggression on the other side. Austria denied no more than Prussia that the claims of the Czar were wholly untenable, and would, if acceded to, destroy the integrity and independence of the Ottoman Empire. But that is a totally different thing from the possession of the Principalities. The Czar of Russia never said he wanted those Principalities at all—but he wanted a great deal more; he wanted to possess power over the whole of the Christian subjects of the Porte, in order that he might at any time he pleased come and extinguish “the sick man,” and take possession of his house and property. You said, when you began this war, that the evacuation of the Principalities was not our only object, but that it was also desired to secure the independence and integrity of the Ottoman Empire in the first instance, and not less to secure the future tranquillity of Europe, and prevent the recurrence of similar claims. That hereafter was not only what the people of England and France expected, but it was avowed and declared by Her Majesty’s Ministers as the object of this country. I do not want to fasten any words on our Ministers as to the objects which they sought to obtain by the war—whether the Crimea was to be taken, and Sebastopol and the Russian fleet destroyed;—but undoubtedly it was avowed by my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs himself, and, I apprehend, by most of the Ministers, that this is a war of civilisation against barbarism—that the war was entered into to secure the future repose of Europe, and that it could not terminate until we had obtained real and material securities that the Emperor of Russia should not be guilty again of the gross offences and outrages which he had endeavoured to commit. But Austria has never gone this length. She has acknowledged that justice is on the side of Turkey; but all that she has done is to sign a treaty at Constantinople, and to address a note to the Czar in conjunction with Prussia. She has confined her efforts solely to the evacuation of the Principalities; and I want to know what security have we as to what the conduct of Austria will be when the Principalities shall be evacuated? Austria is a member of the Germanic Confederation, and we have unfortunately reason to know that Prussia and a considerable number of the Princes of Germany are too well inclined towards Russia. The treaty that was concluded on the 20th of April between Austria and Prussia—which undoubtedly looked to the contingency of stopping the progress of Russia, and effecting the evacuation of the Principalities—was communicated to the Diet at Frankfort, and a Resolution was passed, by which the Diet of Frankfort expressed their desire for the establishment of a common accord and union between all the Powers of Germany; but that union did not go a bit further than an objection to the prolonged occupation of the Principalities. But suppose, when those Principalities are occupied by Austrian troops, it should please Austria to say, “We now rest on the basis of the status quo,” while you say you will not rest upon any such basis at all, the consequence must be that you will come to that very conflict with Germany which you at every possible cost so long desired to avoid. Undoubtedly, as we have justice on our side, seeing that we are engaged, as has been well said, in the support of civilisation against barbarism, and in the support of a weak Power against the unjustifiable aggression of a strong neighbour, we ought not to be afraid to face the German Powers if they should league against England and France; but, my Lords, we shall do so at a great disadvantage, because the Austrians will be in a most advantageous position. I say we have already sacrificed too much for this alliance with Austria, and we should take care that it does not fail us when we require it. Recollect what we sacrificed at the beginning of the war. We prevented Omar Pasha from facing the comparatively petty army of Russia, before it was reinforced by the forces under Lüders, Dannenberg, and Osten Sacken. It was Omar Pasha's opinion that he should face it, and it was the subject of his remonstrance to you. He said, if he were allowed, he would at once defeat and drive before him that army. You hesitated and delayed your hostilities, and gave to Russia every advantage; and all this we did because we wished to secure the concert and uniformity of action of the German Powers. The Turkish army is described by competent authorities as being as fine an army as any in the world. The men, we are told by all authorities, are equal to any army in Europe for patience, courage, and power of endurance. They are worthy to contend by the side of those with whom they are now allied in, I hope, a career of victory. But all persons tell you that the weak point of that army is the way in which it is officered. That is well known. There are officers, however, to be had of the right sort, capable in every respect, knowing well the usages and temper of the men they would command, and knowing the country in which they would act; but those men were not employed, because, out of respect to the German Powers, so far as regards European service, you would not allow them to employ Hungarians. Of course the Sultan would not consent that you should dictate to him what officers he should employ, and what officers he should not employ; and the consequence was, that he was obliged for a considerable time to decline the services of all European officers who applied to him. I say this was an immense disadvantage that you put the Turkish army under; you did it for the purpose of conciliating and of obtaining the concert of the German Powers, and the German Powers ought to be called upon to do a little more than occupy the ground from which the enemy retires. I cannot, of course, know what answer my noble Friend has received. I know not what ground he may have for expecting the real and cordial co-operation of Austria, not only in obtaining her own objects, but your objects and those of civilised Europe; but I hope he will be able to lay before the House the communications and correspondence, as well as to tell us that he has reason to be perfectly satisfied of the intentions of Austria.

I cannot conclude without adverting to the more cheering prospects that we have at this moment in regard to the progress of the war, compared with what has hitherto been the case. It is said that an expedition is in preparation for the Crimea, and it is to be expected that it will be worthy of the two great countries by whom it is undertaken. During the continuance of the mere blockade I did not think it right to say anything whatever in the way of blame, nor do I mean to say it, about that clever and dashing exploit of the Russian vessel the Vladimir. There is no doubt, I believe, that she did come out, and, eluding the vigilance of the British vessels, destroy some Turkish vessels. I do not wish to impute any blame to Admiral Dundas and those under him, for it is to be supposed that he is to be excused, in consequence of his attention, his energies, and a great part of his force being devoted to the execution of the expedition to the Crimea. To that expedition I look with the greatest hope, because, from the experience of the commanders of the allied armies in Turkey, I am well assured they would not undertake that expedition unless they had every reasonable ground for success. It is an expedition that is worthy of the two great countries, and of the armies that have undertaken it; and if there be risk or delay, or delay in the execution, I for one shall not be inclined to criticise too nicely the cause of that delay, or the loss it may occasion. You cannot attain a great object in a moment, or without heavy risk. I have no doubt that all will be done that can be done by skill, and prudence, and bravery, to ensure success; for we know intimately the commanders, and I am delighted to hear that such an expedition is to be undertaken. When next we meet, I hope we shall have still more cheering information of that expedition, and that we shall also have more information on the point to which I have already referred. In conclusion, the noble Marquess moved—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to direct that there be laid before this House a copy of the Convention concluded on the 14th June between Austria and the Sublime Porte; and also copies of the Communication between Her Majesty's Government and the Turkish Ministry relating thereto."

THE EARL OF CLARENDON: My Lords, my noble Friend began his speech with a somewhat elaborate defence of the course which he has taken throughout the present Session with regard to the state of our foreign relations; and as it has been generally my duty to reply to the speeches that my noble Friend has made, I hope he will permit me to say that I have never made against him any of those charges which he has this evening taken pains to refute. I have never impugned his motives, nor complained of the perfect consistency of his conduct; for I must say that from the first day of the Session—all through the Session—and down to the last day of the Session, my noble Friend has not missed an opportunity—and has created many—of marking his want of confidence in the Government, and in their ability to carry on the war in which we are engaged. I do not think either there was any necessity for the comparison which my noble Friend instituted between himself and Mr. Pitt, in order to justify the manner in which he exercised his "privilege" and performed his "duty;" but if I had any disposition to impugn my noble Friend's conduct, or to question the manner in which he exercised that privilege and performed that duty, it would be this night; for about the first half-hour of his speech was occupied in details and facts which it would be most pernicious for the enemy to know.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN: Not facts.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON: Not facts; but my noble Friend has stated them as facts. The noble Marquess seems to have collected his statements with great care, though he has misstated them as matters of fact; though really I am unable, and the noble Duke near me (the Duke of Newcastle) is unable, to reply to them as we would wish, not having had any notice of them. However, assuming they are facts—

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE: I have referred to no statement that has not appeared in the public papers.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON: My noble Friend has referred to many subjects—for instance, to the want of mortars and gunboats, and the necessary inefficiency of our fleets in consequence.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE: All the statements have been made, and in the Government prints, too.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON: With respect to that part of my noble Friend's statement, to which formerly I particularly referred, and which has reference to the treaty between the Porte and Austria, I have to express my regret at not having laid, as I intended long ago to have laid, that document before your Lordships. The last time my noble Friend mentioned the subject I told your Lordships that I would lose no time in laying a copy of it before you; but on referring to the copy of it in the Foreign Office, and finding that it was but a corrected draft with marginal notes of amendments, I should not have hesitated to present it to your Lordships, but it turned out that this draft of the treaty was not signed. It was merely an unsigned copy, and not in the complete shape that would enable me to lay it before your Lordships' House. However, there shall be no delay about laying it before your Lordships. Still, my noble Friend is perfectly cognisant of the treaty; it was published in the Constantinople Gazette, and was published also in other papers. I do not think, my Lords, that this treaty altogether merits the strictures which have been passed upon it by my noble Friend; nor is my noble Friend entitled to say that Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople was instructed to support that treaty, or that the treaty was agreed to by the Porte in consequence of the urgent representations of the Allied Powers. Many months ago the Austrian Government made a communication to Her Majesty's Government, as well as to the French Government, and to that of the Porte, that they would on no account enter upon any part of the Ottoman territory without the permission of the Porte. The Austrian Government stated that it would only be to put down an insurrection in favour of Russia in Serbia, or to prevent the invasion of Serbia by Russian troops, that Austrian troops would enter that province. My noble Friend has alluded with great force to the protest of the Servian Government. I believe he must not rely too much upon that; for if it were not through fear of coercion, an insurrection in favour of Russia would long since have taken place in that province. The Austrian Government also placed its troops at the disposal of the Porte to repress the insurrection in Montenegro. They also told us that in the event of a war with Russia it might be necessary for them to occupy the Principalities, but that they would not do so without a previous solemn agreement with the Porte. The treaty between the Porte and Austria was communicated to us, and after some delay it was signed at Constantinople. We knew nothing of it before that, and no instructions were consequently sent to Lord Stratford, who merely said that he had recommended the Porte to adopt that treaty; and in a month or three weeks afterwards the Government approved of the advice of Lord Stratford. And if Lord Stratford, who is no bad judge of what is for the interest of the Porte, and whether it was for its interest to reject or adopt it, recommended the adoption of the treaty, he did so because he saw that the preamble, as well as the articles, was closely connected with all the proceedings that had taken place at Vienna, in conjunction with England and France, and which were recorded in a protocol, and because he saw nothing in the treaty to prevent the Sultan from taking any measures he pleased for re-establishing his authority in those Principalities, or from taking any part he pleased in occupying them on the withdrawal of the Russians. But even then, as soon as we saw the substance of this convention, our language to Austria was, that the occupation of any portion of the Ottoman territory was a matter of extreme delicacy, and that great care must be taken that everything should be done in the name and on the behalf of the Sultan, and to uphold his authority, and that every measure, whether for the restoration of the Hospodars or otherwise, must be of a temporary character. Towards the end of June, when the Russians were about to evacuate Wallachia—when they had already left Bucharest and news was received at Vienna that they were about to carry with them not only the provincial treasury and the archives, but the principal inhabitants and the national militia—there was an apprehension that a state of complete anarchy might have ensued, because the Turkish troops were, at the end of June, not in a position to cross the Danube; and the Austrian Government communicated to us and to the French Government that they had sent a staff officer of General Hess to the headquarters of Omar Pasha, and of Lord Raglan and Marshal St. Arnaud, to say that they were about to occupy a portion of Wallachia on behalf of the Sultan, and to restore his authority there, although they could not enter as belligerents, because they were not at war with Russia, and had not received an answer to the demand which they had addressed to her. And I may here mention, with respect to the demand addressed by Austria to Russia, that it was not made exactly in the tone, nor was the answer given to it by Russia exactly in the tone, which my noble Friend represented them to be, neither was the date which he stated correct. It was in the beginning of June that the Austrian note was addressed to Russia; it stated the evils that arose to Austria and Germany from the Russian occupation of the Principalities, and it required upon certain conditions, and at an early date, the evacuation of those Principalities. The answer of the Russian Government was not an insolent rejection of these demands, but, on the contrary, it was an offer to adhere to three of the principal points which had been established by the protocol of Vienna. I merely mention this to correct what my noble Friend has misunderstood with regard to these two points. My Lords, the language which we held to Austria when we heard of this announcement of her intention to enter the Principalities was, that if Austrian troops were going to enter Wallachia, which had been evacuated by the Russians, for the purpose of proceeding on to Moldavia in order to drive them out there also, then the convention would be faithfully fulfilled; but that if she were merely going to occupy the province on its evacuation by Russia, then we did not consider that they would be warranted in doing so unless with the consent and by the desire of the Porte. The Austrian answer to this was, that they only intended to enter the Principalities with the view of preventing anarchy, and of establishing order in the name, on the behalf, and at the desire of the Sultan; that they could not enter as belligerents, because they had not yet declared war; but they announced to us that having once entered they would resist by force the return of the Russians. And the Porte replied by appointing an Imperial Commissioner to proceed to the provinces to arrange all these matters on behalf of the Sultan, and to establish a judicial inquiry with respect to the conduct of the Hospodars at the time when the Russian troops entered last year; and it was to depend upon the result of that judicial inquiry whether the Porte would consent to the re-establishment of these Hospodars. The Austrian Government communicated to us their entire satisfaction at such a functionary as this Commissioner having been appointed. We all know that the Principalities were about to be evacuated—at least, Wallachia—because Prince Gortschakoff appears to have taken an affectionate leave of the boyards, and to have burnt and destroyed everything in that country. Now, this result is certainly due to the presence of the allied forces at Varna, and to the bravery of the Turks; but it is mainly owing to the position which the Austrian army has taken up. It is now some time ago since we received information that the Austrian army was being concentrated in the Bukovina and in the north of Transylvania, and their position became so threatening to the Russians in Moldavia that they were no more able to retain that province than Wallachia; and it was only the day before yesterday that we heard that official orders had been received by Prince Gortschakoff to evacuate both these Principalities. My Lords, I am not about to enter into any elaborate defence of Austria, or pretend to be able to explain the motives or the policy of that country; but I certainly see no reason to retract any opinions that I have given with respect to the grounds which make it conduce to the honour, the dignity, and the interests of Austria to act in the manner that we are entitled to expect from her. I entirely agree with my noble Friend that Austria is an independent Power, and has a right to pursue her own policy in her own way; and we have no right to complain of her doing so, because I say, whatever my noble Friend may think as to any sacrifices that the Allied Powers have made, that I entirely deny that our policy has in any way been dependent upon the policy of Austria, or our course of conduct in any manner influenced by her. True, she may not have been so rapid in her movements as we might desire; her army was not prepared, and to bring it up to its present state of efficiency, with 300,000 men, was certainly a work of time as well as of very great expense. As my noble Friend says, the policy of Austria must of course be guided by her sense of her own interests, just as that of England and France must be guided by their interests; and the interests of Austria, let me remind you, are of a far more complicated and antagonistic character than those of either France or England. Our objects and interests—and I recur to them as my noble Friend has again adverted to them, and I have the less hesitation in alluding to them because they are to a great extent shared by in Austria—our objects are that we think the designs of

Russia upon Turkey, as shown by the misuse of treaties at certain times, and by their misinterpretation at other times, are dangerous to the tranquillity of Europe; we think the constantly increasing armaments of that great despotic Power which have created a prestige in the imagination of foreign nations, and have enabled her to extend her influence in quarters where it ought never to have reached, are alike dangerous to the independence of Europe, and to the progress of civilisation. Why, my Lords, at this moment Russia defies England and France and Turkey in arms, and the public opinion of the whole world; and I say that the State or the Sovereign of a country who can do that either possesses, or believes himself to possess, a power which cannot be exercised with safety to others, and particularly when such a power is exercised in support of unjust pretensions. I say further, that if such a power is a reality, it must be curtailed—if it is a delusion, it must be dispelled; and such, I think, will be the result of the present war, and of the great and disinterested efforts of England and France. I say disinterested efforts, my Lords, not because England and France have not a deep and abiding interest in upholding the cause of international justice, and in sustaining the cause of the weak against the strong, and also in the progress and prosperity of other countries, for which peace is the first and an indispensable condition; but I say, when two great commercial and maritime Powers, after having exhausted all the resources of negotiation to maintain peace, deliberately renounce its advantages and engage in a contest which may be very long and must be very costly, solemnly protesting at the same time not to obtain advantages for themselves from the contest, that I say is a disinterested policy. It is a guarantee to Europe for the honesty of their intentions; and, my Lords, I rejoice that it is reserved for our time, and above all for two great nations such as England and France, to place upon record such an engagement, and set an example so generous and so well worthy of imitation. In bringing our fleets and armies to bear against the common enemy, we have not had the same financial and, above all, not the same political difficulties to encounter as Austria has. Those difficulties, for which my noble Friend must make allowance, are principally of a German character; and I do not think we ought to blame

Austria for not advancing till her frontiers were secure. I consider that she has managed her affairs skilfully, and overcome all the manœuvres and tricks that have been resorted to to paralyse her action; and I have great satisfaction in stating to your Lordships that within the last six-and-thirty hours, and consequently since the evacuation of the Principalities by the Russian troops was known at Vienna, notes have been exchanged between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Austria which will show, when they come to be made public, that Austria has as little intention as ourselves to return to the status quo.

My Lords, before I sit down, I will just say a few words with reference to what my noble Friend stated respecting the measures that we have taken, and the position in which we now stand. I beg your Lordships to recollect that it was only upon the 29th of last March that war was declared, or little more than four months ago; and it was at that time the universal opinion—and when I say that, I do not speak of Her Majesty's Government, but of the most experienced military officers of both England and France—that Russia then meditated a war of further aggression. Nobody believed, with the great forces that she had concentrated on the north of the Danube, with all the efforts which for months before she had made, and all the vast supplies she had accumulated, that she did not intend—indeed, everybody felt perfectly convinced that she did intend—to march southwards. And although we did not distrust the known bravery of the Turks, still we could not bring ourselves to believe that they would be able successfully to resist the well-disciplined and, numerically, much superior troops of Russia, under the most experienced generals, while the only experienced general of the Turks whom we knew by name was Omar Pasha, who had not then had the opportunity he has since had, and by which he has so nobly profited, of achieving for himself a lasting renown. My Lords, so much were we and the French Government convinced of this that Sir John Burgoyne and a French officer of engineers were sent to Constantinople in order to devise means for defending that capital and the Dardanelles; and so much importance was attached to their mission, and so entirely was the whole plan of the campaign supposed to be connected with it, that the departure of Lord Raglan and

Marshal St. Arnaud was delayed, that they might have a personal communication with the officers who had been sent out on this specific service. The allied armies then proceeded to Gallipoli, where great works were thrown up. They also went to Constantinople, always keeping in view the necessity of the defence of the Dardanelles. Their arrival there was anxiously expected—they were received with enthusiasm, and their presence imparted new vigour and courage to the Turks. The commanders of the two armies went to Varna, to meet Omar Pasha, and he entertained that a large portion of the allied forces might come to Varna, knowing well how great must be the moral effect of such a movement upon his own troops. The Russians made every exertion to take Silistria before the arrival of the allied forces. The fortress was most heroically defended by the Turks. The arrival of the allied armies was most useful to them; and, as your Lordships are aware, the siege was raised, and the Russian army recrossed the Danube; the Dobrodscha was for the most part evacuated; and all thoughts of a southward movement on the part of the Russians were at an end. Offensive warfare on their part is no longer dreamt of; and the allied armies are now ready to commence, and perhaps they have already commenced, those more important operations to which my noble Friend alluded. Then, again, my Lords, as to the Baltic, we have certainly sent out there the finest and most powerful fleet which ever left the shores of this country; and if great successes are not to be obtained against a Power who obstinately refuses battle, and shuts up his fleet within granite walls, yet his ships are blockaded and useless; and when we consider what the amount of our trade is, and how we depend upon that trade for our revenue, and in fact for our position as a first-rate Power among the nations of Europe, I say it is not an unimportant thing that, in a war with a great maritime Power, our ships traverse every sea unmolested, and as unconscious of danger as in times of profoundest peace. While the Russian fleets are thus blockaded, our commerce flourishes, and the trade of Russia, I must say with all deference to my noble Friend, is nearly extinct. I am not as able to quote prices as my noble Friend, or to tell upon what terms certain Russian productions can be brought to this country; but I know, at least, that none of them come from the Russian ports in the Baltic, though some of them may, perhaps, come from the Black Sea. There may be—although I know nothing of it—some Russian tallow sent from Memel; but when we consider the great expense of carrying Russian products overland—that, for example, tallow brought from Memel has increased in price, thereby, from 10*l.* to 20*l.* a ton—it cannot be thought that much business will be carried on at that price. We must consider, too, that the trade with Russia is usually conducted with English capital, that English capital is indispensable for their products and for bringing them to market, and that that has been entirely withdrawn; therefore the trade of Russia may be said to have entirely ceased, and the industry of that country to have been, to a great extent, paralysed, whilst the want of markets has deprived the Russian proprietors of what they are in the habit of reckoning upon in order to meet the heavy expenses to which they are subject. Now, my Lords, I know that these are not very heroic results; but I am sure they will do that which my noble Friend has pointed out as being so desirable—they will create a severe pressure upon all classes in Russia, and exercise an influence upon public opinion there, which I quite agree with my noble Friend does exist, and produce a greater impression there than would even be produced if Sebastopol or Cronstadt had fallen, and our national vanity and ambition been thereby more flattered. My Lords, we know that, in order to maintain herself in this war, and uphold her authority over her vast territories, Russia has been compelled, not only to keep up, but to increase her huge armies on the shores of the Baltic, in Livonia, in Finland, in Poland, on the Danube, in Circassia, and in the Crimea; and we know also the immense loss of life that has been occasioned, and the great number of conscripts and recruits who are required to supply the deficiencies caused by those deaths. I know not what those numbers are, but we have seen the Imperial ukases issued from time to time, calling for 2 per cent, 3 per cent, 5 per cent, and, in Poland, even 7 per cent of the male population, the whole being taken from the landed proprietors; and when you remember that the value of every serf to his proprietor is reckoned at not less than 60*l.*, you may have some notion of the direct tax which is thus placed upon the Russian landed interest—and this a tax, too, which falls not upon revenue, but upon capital. All this must produce a pressure in Russia, not only upon those classes who are favourable to the war, but also upon the people who are not favourable to the war, and who, notwithstanding that their fanaticism has been appealed to, have yet refused to believe that religion is in danger simply because Imperial ukases have been published stating that it was so. Your Lordships also know that, from the perfidy of the Greek Government, an insurrection was excited and spread over important parts of Turkey, and that this insurrection, which was raised at the instigation of Russia, threatened to create a most formidable diversion in favour of that Power. Well, this has been entirely put down by the energy and determination of the English and French Governments. The insurgents have returned to Greece and laid down their arms; peace has been restored; and I believe there are now better prospects of improvement in that misgoverned country than have existed there at any time during the last twenty years. And during all this time the good understanding and the friendly feelings which prevailed between the allied armies and fleets have only served to cement more closely those cordial relations which, I am happy to say, subsist between the two countries. The notions upon which the Emperor of Russia unfortunately relied last year, namely, that the people of this country were enervated by peace, that our alliance with France was only a rope of sand, and that the two nations could never be brought to act together, have been as practically disproved as the prestige of Russia for her overwhelming military power and her unequalled diplomatic skill have been completely dispelled. I say, then, that these are neither trifling nor unpromising results to be attained in the course of four or five short months. My Lords, I have often said that it is useless to state now what ought to be the conditions upon which we may make peace; but we all know, and are all of the same opinion, that the objects for which we make this war are, to obtain a just, an honourable, and—as far as human foresight can procure it—a lasting peace. And we believe that no peace will be just or honourable, or be likely to be lasting, which does not secure the independence and integrity of the Turkish Empire—which does not make the Ottoman Empire a part of the general system of European policy—which does not protect the Ottoman Empire from menace, and secure it from danger. I say, my Lords, that without this, peace could neither be just nor honourable, nor lasting. In order to accomplish these objects, we desire the co-operation of other Governments, but we are not dependent upon them. France and England will not relax in their efforts. They rely upon their own great resources, upon the justice of their cause, and upon the support which they receive at home. And, my Lords, although we are ready to negotiate for peace, we are determined never to do so until we have good evidence of bona fide intentions and a willingness to accept those conditions which we feel are just, and to which the whole of Europe is as entitled as it is interested in our obtaining.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE replied: He contended that he had correctly stated the purport of the Austrian demand upon Russia. That demand did not insist upon the immediate retreat of the Russians from the Danube, or upon anything else excepting the territorial integrity of the Ottoman Empire. The noble Earl had complained that he had given information that would be serviceable to the enemy. If the noble Earl was so sore on that point, he wondered why he had not applied the same observation to statements that had been made in the other House of Parliament, which afforded information that even astonished the country. He (the Marquess of Clanricarde) had given no further details to the enemy than this, that when our ships were out making a reconnaissance for eleven hours before Bomarsund, for four and a half out of the eleven hours one ship and another was aground, and therefore the operation ceased. But the only information he had given that night that was original was, that there were ships built in America of 180 tons burden, and drawing scarcely from three to four feet of water, and capable of navigating waters like those of the Baltic. And yet when he mentioned matters of this kind, by which he thought efficient service might be rendered to the country, he was met with the taunt that he was affording assistance to the enemy.

THE SLAVE TRADE IN CUBA.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON said, he wished to take that opportunity of communicating to their Lordships the contents of a despatch from Her Majesty's Consul General at the Havannah, which had arrived so recently that they had not been included among the papers already presented to their Lordships. As it had often been his painful duty—as it had been that of other Members of the House—to call attention to the negligent manner in which the treaties between Spain and this country, with reference to the slave trade, had been carried out, he had now great satisfaction in stating that since the appointment of the last Captain General of Cuba a marked improvement in the mode of executing the treaties had been apparent; regulations of the most useful kind had not only been adopted, but carried into effect; a system for the registration of slaves had been established throughout the island; and all officials who were found to be connected with the traffic in slaves were immediately removed. The Consul General stated that, under the orders that had been issued, he understood that nearly all the most recently imported Africans had been released from slavery, and that the officer who was employed by the Spanish Government in this service had displayed great energy and activity in the performance of his duty by tracing and following up the negroes brought over, and releasing them. The despatch stated—

"I have no hesitation in acquainting your Lordship that these energetic measures cannot fail to have a most salutary effect, and that the Government are determined to enforce the observance of the treaties."

Since that, another despatch had been received, which stated that three district Governors of the island of Cuba had been removed from their districts, and were then under trial in consequence of not having carried out their orders with due effect.

He was sorry to say that in consequence of the state of affairs in Spain the Governor General of Cuba (the Marquess of Pezuela) had been recalled; but General Espartero had given the best evidence of his intention to act in the same spirit by appointing General Concha to the important office of Governor General of Cuba. He could assure their Lordships that no efforts on the part of Her Majesty's Government would be wanting to secure a continuance of the good measures which had been adopted, and he had every reason to hope, from his knowledge of General Espartero, that he would take the same course. Before he sat down he would mention another matter which he thought well deserved public notice. For some months past there had been a report which, he was sorry to say, was very generally believed in the United States, notwithstanding all the forms of contradiction that had been given to it, that it had been for some time past the fixed intention of Her Majesty's Government to Africanise the island of Cuba and establish a black republic there, which it was considered would be most dangerous to the tranquillity of the Southern States; and that rumour had been made the pretext for all those bucaneeering expeditions against Cuba which he believed the President and Government of the United States were most earnest in their endeavours to put a stop to. He had been asked whether such a treaty was not in existence, or whether negotiations had not been entered into for the formation of such a treaty; but his answer was, that the first rumour he ever heard on the subject came from the other side of the Atlantic; that they had never made any other application to the Government of Spain than for the faithful observance of the treaties to put down the slave trade which the United States, just as much as themselves, were bound to assist in. The report in question had obtained so much ground in America that he thought it his duty, on the last opportunity which he would have of bringing the subject before the House this Session, to give this formal contradiction to the report.

NEW ZEALAND GOVERNMENT ACT—
PETITION.

LORD MONTEAGLE presented a petition from members of the Provincial Council of Auckland for the amendment of the New Zealand Government Act.

This petition was deserving of the greatest possible attention on the part of their Lordships, because it had been signed by all the members of the Provincial Assembly of the settlement of Auckland, from which it emanated. The grievance of which the petitioners complained was one which had been imposed upon them by an Act of the Imperial Legislature, and that body alone could, therefore, relieve them from it. In the Act giving a constitution to New Zealand, which was passed two years ago, a clause—opposed at the time by the noble Duke now Secretary for War (the Duke of Newcastle) in that House, and by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer in the other—was inserted, creating a charge of 268,000*l.* in favour of the New Zealand Company upon the Crown lands of New Zealand, which, subject to this liability, were transferred to the colonists. Now, this charge in favour of the Company was felt as a great grievance by the whole of the colonists, but especially by the inhabitants of the province of New Munster, who had never, either directly or indirectly, derived the slightest advantage from the sums expended in the island by the Company. The petitioners, therefore, prayed the House to take measures to relieve them from a charge which they felt to be unjust; and, in conclusion, they declared their determination to resist by every legitimate means the payment of *1*s. from the revenue of the province which they represented to the New Zealand Company. And they stated that they felt the greatest confidence that the House would encourage their determination not to evade a reasonable obligation, but to oppose a charge which they believed to be oppressive and unjust.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, that his noble Friend had referred to what had passed two years ago, and to the part which he took in the debates on the New Zealand Constitution Act two years ago. He could only say that he fully adhered to every opinion which he then expressed, and that he had stated so when he held the Seals of the Colonial Office. In reply to a question which Earl Grey put to him towards the close of last Session, he had stated that he considered the arrangement made by the late Government with the New Zealand Company was not of an equitable character, as regarded the inhabitants of New Zealand, and especially those of the province of Auckland; but that he, nevertheless, thought that no alteration could be made in that arrangement, which was sanctioned by Act of Parliament, until the Colony should have taken the initiative in appealing to the House and the Government for any relief to which it deemed itself entitled. In consequence, however, of the distance of this Colony from England, no remonstrance in an authoritative form against this Act was received thence until a few days before he left the Colonial Office. Had he remained there he should certainly have taken the subject into consideration, in order to see whether any relief could be afforded to the Colony without inflicting injustice on the Company, which had received a benefit from the legislation of Parliament; for, however little they might be entitled to that advantage at the time they received it, the Act of Parliament which had passed had placed them in a different position, and given them a vested right to it. He knew, from personal communication with his right hon. Friend now at the head of the Colonial Office, that he had turned his attention to the subject; and without saying how an arrangement could be made, or without even committing the Government to any positive engagement that an arrangement could or would be made, he could assure his noble Friend that the Government were deeply impressed with the importance of this question, as it affected the prosperity of the colony of New Zealand, and that their attention would be earnestly directed to it.

Petition ordered to lie on the table.
House adjourned till To-morrow.

PARLIAMENTARY RETURNS.

MR. FITZROY said, the hon. and gallant Member for Ayrshire (Colonel Blair)

VOL. CXXXV. [THIRD SERIES.]

had lately put to him a question with reference to a return moved for by the hon. Member for Elgin (Mr. Cumming Bruce) some weeks ago, and he had told the hon. and gallant Gentleman on that occasion that he was not aware in what stage this return was. He had now brought down these papers, which had just been placed in his hand, in order that the House might see the bulk of this return, and might have some idea of the time, labour, and consequent expense which were occasioned by the custom now pursued of moving for returns to obtain information which was already within the reach of Members of that House. [The hon. Gentleman here placed on the table a large mass of MS.] He was informed that the whole of the information to be derived from this return was to be found in the Census papers, which had already, as the House knew, cost the country many thousand pounds. He was further assured that the hon. Member who had moved for it was informed at the time that he could obtain all the information he sought for in the pages of the Census Returns. As this was a habit which was really becoming rather a nuisance, and as the country was liable every year to enormous expense for the production of returns, which, in many cases, did not contain information of vital importance, he did hope, before the next Session of Parliament, that means would be devised by which some check might be put to this practice. Perhaps he might be allowed to refer to some particulars of a return moved for in 1852, and which had only been laid before the House this Session with respect to local rates. This return was subdivided into so many heads and comprised so much detail that the cost of the paper alone and the number of different persons employed in procuring that return were really almost incredible. With the permission of the House, he would read a short statement which had been prepared on the subject. To obtain this return upwards of 34,500 circular letters were sent out from the Poor Law Board and the Home Office, and returns were received in accordance with those letters. These returns, having been received, had to be made up into 328 tables, and 260 distinct calculations were made in order to reduce them into their proper form. The paper alone required was seventy-two reams of foolscap, and the weight of the paper, together with the envelopes, was 1,388 pounds. He was told that that return, which had never yet been added up, because no office could be found to undertake the task with its present staff, would require two clerks during at least one year, in order to add up the separate items, and that, when completed, they would afford the House no information whatever beyond what it already possessed. He hoped this was a subject which would not be thought unworthy the attention of the House, and that some means would be devised by which the enormous expense entailed upon the country in this way might be prevented.

NEW WRIT FOR CANTERBURY.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, he rose, pursuant to notice, to move that new writs be issued for Canterbury, Cambridge, Maldon, Barnstaple, and Kingston-upon-Hull. The wording of the Amendment which the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. T. Duncombe) had put upon the paper would appear rather to indicate a wish on his part that the House should delay indefinitely the issue of those writs than that they should adopt the ballot. There were a great many Members in that House who had great faith in secret voting. He confessed he (Sir W. Jolliffe) was not one of those gentlemen, for, on the contrary, he had the greatest faith in publicity. He was not there in any way to defend those delinquent boroughs; he regretted their delinquency extremely—it was most lamentable; and he thought it was the province of that House to apply itself to remedy the evil, and if possible to remedy it effectually. He might, however, remind the House that the issue of the writs in question had been delayed of late in order to enable the House to pass the Bribery Bill; and that Bill having now become law, it would come into operation immediately in the boroughs for which he now moved the issue of new writs. That being the case, it appeared to him the House had no other course left but to issue the writs. Besides, a constitutional question arose in the matter. It had always been held that that House should consist of 658 Members. Now, the effect of the course which had been taken with regard to these boroughs had been to deprive the House during the whole of the present, and part of the last Session, of ten English Members, and this, in addition to the four Members whose seats were not filled up, in the case of the disfranchised boroughs of St. Albans and Sudbury. That made altogether fourteen English Members of whose services the country was deprived, in addition to those who were absent from England in consequence of the war. Now, a limit should be put by the House to proceedings of this kind, and he hoped, therefore, the Motion of which he had given notice would be adopted. In conclusion, he would ask what would be said if the House were to attempt to keep vacant for any considerable period a large number of Irish seats or seats for the metropolitan boroughs?

Motion made, and Question proposed—

“That Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown, to make out a new Writ for the electing of two Citizens to serve in this present Parliament for the City of Canterbury, in the room of Henry Plumpton Gipps, esquire, and of the Honourable Henry Butler Johnstone, whose Election has been determined to be void.”

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, his hon. Friend (Sir W. Jolliffe) had exercised a wise discretion in not saying much in reference to these boroughs; for the least said respecting them was soonest mended. He would, however, endeavour shortly to supply the omissions of his hon. Friend. He had been asked by his hon. Friend if he would make such a Motion in the case of the metropolitan boroughs. He would tell his hon. Friend that should the occasion arise he would deal with them in the same way as the five delinquent boroughs. He wanted to have the experiment of the ballot tried upon these five cases, and he was certain it could never be better tested than by them. He would not go over the able arguments which had been used by his hon. Friend the Member for Bristol (Mr. H. Berkeley), and his right hon. Friend the Member for Southwark (Sir W. Molesworth), in favour of the ballot. The House knew perfectly well how the question stood. Two Cabinet Ministers had spoken on the question of the ballot when it was last under discussion in the House. The one of them, the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston), said the ballot was a nasty, dirty, mean, and un-English proceeding—and declared it was all nonsense. The other said it was the only cure for the evils of which they had to complain. His hon. Friend (Sir W. Jolliffe) might have added to the list of Members of whose services the House was now deprived the name of one of the Members for the City of London (Baron Rothschild), who, owing to the bigotry and intolerance of hon. Gentlemen on the other side and the House of Lords, was obliged to take his seat under the gallery. He was like a person sitting in the porter's hall till my Lords and hon. Gentlemen opposite asked him to come in. This was an insult to the citizens of London—it was degrading to the individual, and humiliating to the House of Commons. The Commissions for conducting the inquiry into these delinquent boroughs cost the country 30,000*l.*, and all they were to have for the money was a trumpery Bribery Bill. The issue of the writ for Canterbury was the Motion now before the House. Canterbury was an archiepiscopal borough. The sooner the Archbishop changed the name the better. He would recommend to him the name of one of the metropolitan boroughs—Finsbury, for instance. Cambridge was an ancient seat of learning, and bribery “systematically prevailed” there for a long period. The same was the case with Hull. The ballot might be the means of recalling to the electors of Hull the times when they elected Andrew Marvel. It was the electors who paid his expenses. They “treated” him, and not he them—for they made him a present of a large barrel of ale, “of a quantity and quality enough to make a sober man neglect his duty in the House.” It was a perfect farce to send these writs to these boroughs under the Bribery Bill. He had received a letter from the town clerk of Barnstaple, who said that the “issuing of the writ would infallibly disfranchise the borough, the representation of it being in the hands of those who did not appreciate it except as a saleable commodity.”

One of the hon. Members for Devonshire presented what he called “a respectable petition” from 600 or 700 persons in favour of the issuing of the writ to Barnstaple. Now he was informed that of these only 317 were electors, and that 215 out of the 317 were in the Commissioners’ schedule. Even though he should not carry his Amendment, he would oppose the issuing of the writs till they had an amended Controverted Elections Bill. He regretted that Her Majesty’s Ministers were not present. He understood that the ballot was an open question with them. But there was a strong feeling growing up that this open-question system was but an ingenious device for screening what were called placemen. He supposed they left the question to be fought by his hon. Friend and himself. He should conclude by moving the Amendment of which he had given notice.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words—

“Whereas Her Majesty, in pursuance of the provisions of an Act passed in the 15th and 16th of Her Majesty, c. 57, intituled, ‘An Act to provide for more effectual inquiry into the existence of Corrupt Practices at Elections for Members to serve in Parliament,’ and in compliance with the prayer of the joint Addresses of both Houses of Parliament, did appoint, under Her Royal Sign Manual, certain persons to be Commissioners, for the purpose of making such ‘more effectual inquiry’ into the corrupt practices alleged to have existed in the Election of Members for Canterbury, Cambridge, Kingston upon Hull, Maldon, and Barnstaple. And whereas the said Commissioners have reported to Her Majesty—That corrupt practices extensively prevailed at the last Election for the City of Canterbury, and at previous Elections: That Bribery, Treating, and other corrupt practices have for a long period systematically prevailed at Elections for the Borough of Cambridge: That systematic corruption has uniformly prevailed at all the Elections in Kingston upon Hull to which their notices had been called. That corrupt practices in various forms had long prevailed at Elections for Maldon, and that open and direct Bribery was practised, at the last Election, to a greater extent than at any which preceded it; that the Bribery Oath was tendered to each voter as he came to the poll, and that it was freely taken by all, however recent, open, and unquestionable the bribe to them may have been, and this shamelessness was in some cases increased by their becoming witnesses before the Commission of the double fact of their own bribery and perjury; that a large portion of the Electors, consisting chiefly of the poorer class of freemen, had, in giving their votes, been influenced by considerations of money and other benefits to themselves, and that such influences had been habitually employed to corrupt them, but that the blame of such corruption did not rest so much with them as with their superiors, by whom the temptation to it was held out: That corrupt practices extensively prevailed at the last Election for Barnstaple; that, of the 696 voters who polled, 256 received bribes; that, in the majority of cases, those who received bribes came forward and admitted their delinquency, but in some instances the efforts of the Commission to elicit the truth were met with gross evasion, prevarication, and even perjury, but these instances were not confined to the lowest class of voters—men whose position in life ought to have placed them beyond the reach of corrupt influences attempted to screen their venality by denying it upon oath; and apparently decent and respectable tradesmen were induced to commit the crime of perjury, in order to preserve their position in the eyes of their fellow townsmen, and thus to hide the shame of their electoral corruption: It is expedient that, previous to the issue of any New Writ to either of the aforesaid places, provision be made to enable the Electors thereof to give their votes by way of Ballot,”—

NEW WRIT FOR CAMBRIDGE.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, he would now move the issue of the writ for Cambridge.

Motion made, and Question proposed—

"That Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown, to make out a New Writ for the electing of two Burgesses to serve in this present Parliament for the Borough of Cambridge, in the room of Kenneth Macaulay, esquire, and John Harvey Astell, esquire, whose Election has been determined to be void."

MR. H. BERKELEY said, he had never, as had been asserted by the hon. Member for Petersfield (Sir W. Jolliffe), on more than one occasion, put forward the ballot as a panacea for bribery and corruption. What he had said was, that the ballot was a perfect remedy for intimidation, but he had never said it was as regarded bribery. On the contrary, he thought that so long as one man was willing to purchase a vote and another man pleased to sell his vote, and so long as they could come to an arrangement between themselves, and could trust each other, there would be no possibility of getting rid of bribery by any known means. He had always said so; but then he had likewise stated that the ballot would destroy the confidence between the buyer and the seller, which was one way of putting down bribery and corruption. As regarded Maldon and Barnstaple, the Government had distinctly pledged themselves to increase the constituencies in those boroughs; and he hoped they were not so far lost to all sense of propriety as not in some way or other to redeem that pledge. With an increase of the constituencies he thought that the ballot would prove the best means of repressing bribery which could be adopted. In regard to the borough of Cambridge, he had only to say that wherever there was a University there was intimidation. The intimidation carried on by the University of Oxford was a palpable, notorious, and crying evil. The same observation applied equally to Cambridge, which was as corrupt a place as any in the kingdom. He should have been delighted to have seen the ballot tried upon Cambridge; but, as it seemed to be the determination of the House that that should not be, it was with the greatest possible pleasure that he should oppose the issuing of the writ for the borough of Cambridge.

MR. HUME said, he must express his deep regret that the Government had not thought fit to make an experiment of the ballot on this occasion, and he likewise thought they were highly to blame for not coming down to the House to state their reasons for refusing their assent to the proposal of the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. T. Duncombe). It was true that the House had heard from the Treasury bench one good speech in favour of the ballot, and one bad speech against it; but the opinion of the Government ought to have been stated upon the present occasion, and he hoped the country would not forget the small majority against the proposition of the hon. Member for Finsbury. For his own part, if the Government did not fulfil the pledges they had given with respect to measures of reform, he did not know how far he would be able to support them in their present position.

MR. MALINS said, that hon. Gentlemen opposite might depend upon it that, so long as the franchise was in the hands of men who were in such distressed circumstances that they could not resist a bribe when it was offered to them, it would be impossible by the ballot, or any other means, to put a stop to corrupt practices at elections. The Cambridge Commissioners stated, in their Report, that of the 111 persons who received bribes at the last election, no fewer than 108 were householders who voted upon very low rentals. It appeared that the number of freemen who had been bribed in that borough was 1 in 7; of householders rated at not more than 10*l.*, 1 in 8; at above 10*l.* and under 15*l.*, 1 in 11; at above 15*l.* and under 20*l.*, 1 in 16; above 20*l.* and under 30*l.*, 1 in 30; above 30*l.* and under 40*l.*, 1 in 55; and above 40*l.* none. One of the witnesses declared that if the franchise were limited to rentals of 20*l.*, instead of descending to rentals of 10*l.*, it would be entirely useless to attempt to buy the votes of the electors. In these circumstances, he would suggest to hon. Gentlemen opposite whether it would not be better, instead of trying the ballot, to devise some scheme by which the elective franchise might be elevated, or, if kept at its present level, by which there might be something like a graduated scale of voting.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he would also refer to the Report of the Commissioners, who said that the price generally paid for a vote in the borough was 10*l.*, although some of the electors were so dishonest as not to vote at all, notwithstanding they had received the money beforehand.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, he begged to explain that he had not stated what had been attributed to him by the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. H. Berkeley), that secret voting would not protect persons against oppression.

NEW WRIT FOR MALDON.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, he would now move that the writ be issued for the election of two Members to serve in Parliament for the borough of Maldon.

Motion made, and Question proposed—

"That Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown, to make out a New Writ for the electing of two Burgesses to serve in this present Parliament for the Town of Maldon, in the room of Charles du Cane, esquire, and Taverner John Miller, esquire, whose Election has been determined to be void."

NEW WRIT FOR BARNSTAPLE.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, he would next move that the writ be issued for the election of two Members to serve in Parliament for the borough of Barnstaple.

Motion made, and Question proposed—

"That Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown, to make out a New Writ for the electing of two Burgesses to serve in this present Parliament for the Borough of Barnstaple, in the room of Sir William Augustus Fraser, baronet, and of Richard Bremridge, esquire, whose Election has been determined to be void."

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he thought it was time that he should ask where had all the subordinate Members of Her Majesty's Government been during the last two divisions ? He could not see his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty nor his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General. Where, too, was the right hon. Baronet the Member for Southwark (Sir W. Molesworth), who had described the denial of these writs as the panacea both for bribery and intimidation. The noble Lord the President of the Council had been attending Her Majesty in Council, and therefore his non-attendance at an earlier period was excusable. Now that he had arrived, he (Mr. Duncombe) would like to hear his opinion upon the question of issuing the writ for Barnstaple. The noble Lord had presented a petition from certain voters of that place, in which they complained of the mal-practices at previous elections, and said that, rather than such things should be renewed, they would desire to remain unrepresented. Did the noble Lord think that the measure which had recently been passed would prevent a recurrence of such mal-practices ? The noble Lord, when he moved, on the 2nd of June, that seven days' notice should be given of any Motion for issuing these writs, stated that Barnstaple was a very bad case, and that at once to issue the writs without taking any notice would be almost a direct inducement to bribery. The noble Lord then went on to declare that, in his opinion, the only way to deal with the matter was to disfranchise those voters who had been guilty of receiving bribes. This, said the noble Lord, was better than a system of pecuniary penalties. But he (Mr. Duncombe) would now remind the noble Lord, that the measure which had lately been passed only imposed a system of penalties. Hence he hoped—whatever might have been the decision of the House as to the other writs—that hon. Members would unite in opposing the issue of a writ for Barnstaple.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, he also hoped the House would not issue writs for a borough which was so utterly profligate and lost to all sense of what was right.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he regretted that he had not been present at an earlier period of the discussion, but he had been obliged to attend Her Majesty in Council. With respect to the question before the House, he much regretted that the Bills which had been brought in by his hon. and learned Friend (the Attorney General) to disfranchise electors of these boroughs who had accepted bribes, owing to the objection that some pledge of immunity had been given by the Commissioners, could not be proceeded with. He had felt that it was a matter of some difficulty to decide whether the writs should issue or not, but as they had passed a Bill with respect to bribery and treating, he thought it was desirable that they should not any longer keep these places from exercising their legal right of returning Members to Parliament. It was very true that that Bill had been passed only for a limited period ; still it contained a clause that the names of persons who had been convicted of bribery might be sent to the revising barrister, who could strike them out of the list of voters. They would be placed in separate lists, so that every one might see that they had the stigma of bribery affixed to them. He conceived that this would be a considerable discouragement to bribery, and it would likewise be necessary for a candidate to give an account of all his expenses, and, if any of them had been unduly incurred, investigation would take place. He conceived, therefore, that a good deal had been done to check bribery, and he should be glad to see whether bribery would take place on future occasions at Barnstaple and other places to the same extent as formerly. The Select Committee upon Controverted Elections would be again appointed next year, and that question would be fully gone into.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he must beg to express his great satisfaction at hearing that the noble Lord intended to introduce next Session a Bill for the amendment of the law for the trial of controverted elections. He was disappointed at the declaration clause having been thrown out of the Bribery Bill ; but it must not be forgotten that a candidate might be called upon to answer upon oath, on the trial of an election petition, as to all the matters which were the subject of the declaration.

Question put.

NEW WRIT FOR KINGSTON UPON HULL.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, the last Motion he had to bring forward on this subject was, that a new writ should issue for the borough of Kingston upon Hull.

Motion made, and Question proposed—

“ That Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown, to make out a Writ for the electing of two Burgesses to serve in this present Parliament for the Town of Kingston upon Hull, in the room of James Clay, esquire, and George Frederick Samuel Robinson, esquire, commonly called Viscount Goderich, whose Election has been determined to be void.”

MR. HUME said, he begged to ask the noble Lord whether, if the Bribery Bill failed, he would consider all had been done that could be done by legislation, and be prepared to try the ballot.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he did not think the ballot would be a remedy, and could not admit that the question of further legislation was affected by the failure of this Bill, because parts of the Bill recommended by the Committee had not been agreed to, and the Controverted Elections Bill had been withdrawn. He supposed his hon. Friend would give ten or twenty years for this experiment. At all events, he did not think the trial of the ballot in these isolated cases would be a fair experiment, because if these places, having been made notorious, intended to regain their character, whatever the mode, the elections would be pure.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he thought this a most painful and humiliating discussion, and that the majority of the Government was disgracefully small, considering the period of the Session, when independent Members generally were gone out of town. In his view, they committed a great injustice if they issued these writs and refused to restore the franchise to St. Albans and Sudbury. He expected much, however, from the promised Reform Bill of the noble Lord next Session. He trusted it would give an extension of the franchise ; but, with the infusion of new blood, he hoped there would also be improved conduct. He regretted that he should have to trouble the House by taking one more division.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he wished to give notice that it was his intention in the next Session of Parliament to re-introduce the Bill which he had this year presented to Parliament, for enabling voters to give their votes by written declaration before the magistrates in every parish, which would at once and for ever dispose of the perplexing questions of travelling expenses and expenses of refreshment, and render resort to the ballot unnecessary.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Saturday, August 12, 1854.

PROROGATION OF THE PARLIAMENT.

This day being appointed for the Prorogation of the PARLIAMENT by THE QUEEN in Person, HER MAJESTY entered the House at a quarter after two o'clock, accompanied by the PRINCE ALBERT, and attended by the Great Officers of State.

THE QUEEN being seated on the Throne, and the Commons (who were sent for) being come with their Speaker,

MR. SPEAKER made the following speech to HER MAJESTY—

“ MOST GRACIOUS SOVEREIGN,

“ WE, Your Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, attend Your Majesty with our last Bill of Supply for the service of the present year.

“ In reviewing the labours of the past Session, we have humbly to thank Your Majesty for Your gracious permission to bring under our annual revision a large amount of public expenditure connected with the principal revenue departments which have hitherto been exempt from Parliamentary control. It will be our duty in future years, with a just regard to economy, to make ample provision for these important branches of the public service.

“ In obedience to Your Majesty's commands, we have endeavoured to impose an effectual check on bribery and corrupt practices at elections, and we venture to hope that the Act lately passed—which clearly defines these offences, applies to them an adequate punishment, and places election expenses under efficient control—will prove successful in repressing a practice which is alike demoralising to the elector and fatal to the integrity of representative institutions.

“ We have given the most attentive consideration to a measure for the good government and extension of the University of Oxford, by which certain oaths now required to be taken by students have been abrogated, provision made for the establishment of private halls, and enlarged powers given both to the University and to its colleges. We have every confidence that these enactments will be received by that learned body in the spirit in which they have been framed, and that they will be enabled to extend the benefits of academical education to classes of the community who, from their circumstances or their religious opinions, have hitherto been precluded from the enjoyment of this privilege.

“ Various other measures have been submitted to us; but it has been found impossible to mature them during the Session, as the progress of our legislation has been interrupted by the commencement of a war which, notwithstanding Your Majesty's unremitting endeavours to maintain peace, has been forced upon us by the unwarrantable aggression of Russia on the Turkish empire.

“ Deploring most deeply the necessity for such a contest, we recognise the imperative duty of protecting an old and faithful Ally from oppression and of vindicating the rights of nations; and we believe it well becomes the character and honour of this great empire, adhering to the faith of treaties, to frustrate, if possible, the designs of a Monarch whose ambition, if uncontrolled, would endanger the security of every nation in Europe.

“ Entertaining these views, Your faithful Commons have cheerfully, and without hesitation, placed at the disposal of Your Majesty whatever supplies have been deemed requisite to carry on this just and unavoidable war, thus enabling Your Majesty to send forth fleets and armies complete beyond all former precedent in discipline and equipment.

“ The efforts of Your Majesty to strengthen the arms and aid the cause of Turkey have been cordially seconded by the Emperor of the French, and the joint forces of England and France—their ancient hostility converted into generous emulation—now threaten the coasts and harbours of Russia to the most distant extremity of her vast dominions.

“ The issue of this momentous struggle is in the hands of an overruling Providence. Confident in the justice of our cause, we looked forward with hope to its successful termination, acknowledging with the deepest gratitude that, while war in all its terrors is raging abroad, Your Majesty's subjects, under Your Majesty's well-ordered and beneficent rule, are enjoying the blessings of uninterrupted tranquillity at home.

"I have now to pray Your Majesty's assent to an Act for appropriating the sums voted for the service of the year—the Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) Bill—to which I humbly pray Your Majesty's assent."

And Mr. SPEAKER delivered the Money Bill to the Clerk; and the Royal Assent was then pronounced to several Bills.

HER MAJESTY was then pleased to make a most Gracious Speech to both Houses of Parliament, as follows:—

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"I AM enabled by the State of Public Business to release you from a longer Attendance in Parliament.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"IN closing the Session it affords Me great Pleasure to express My Sense of the Zeal and Energy you have shown in providing Means for the vigorous Prosecution of the War, in which, notwithstanding My Efforts to avert it, we are now engaged. This Liberality in granting the Supplies for the Public Service demands My warmest Thanks; and although I lament the increased Burthens of My People, I fully recognise your Wisdom in sacrificing Considerations of present Convenience, and in providing for the immediate Exigencies of the War without an Addition being made to the permanent Debt of the Country.

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"IN cordial Co-operation with The Emperor of the French, My Efforts will be directed to the effectual Repression of that ambitious and aggressive Spirit on the Part of Russia which has compelled Us to take up Arms in defence of an Ally, and to secure the future Tranquillity of Europe.

"You will join with Me in Admiration of the Courage and Perseverance manifested by the Troops of The Sultan in their Defence of Silistria, and in the various Military Operations on the Danube.

"THE engrossing Interest of Matters connected with the Progress of the War has prevented the due Consideration of some of those Subjects which at the opening of the Session I had recommended to your Attention; but I am happy to acknowledge the Labour and Diligence with which you have perfected various important Measures well calculated to prove of great Public Utility.

"You have not only passed an Act for opening the Coasting Trade of the United Kingdom, and for removing the last legislative Restriction upon the Use of Foreign Vessels, but you have also revised and consolidated the whole Statute Law relating to Merchant Shipping.

"THE Act for establishing the direct Control of the House of Commons over the Charges incurred in the Collection of the Revenue will give more complete Effect to an important Principle of the Constitution, and will promote Simplicity and Regularity in our System of Public Account.

"I REJOICE to perceive that Amendments in the Administration of Law have continued to occupy your Attention, and I anticipate great Benefit from the Improvements you have made in the Forms of Procedure in the Superior Courts of Common Law.

"THE Means you have adopted the better Government of the University of Oxford, and the Improvement in its Constitution, I trust will tend greatly to increase the Usefulness and to extend the Renown of this great Seminary of Learning.

"I HAVE willingly given My Assent to the Measure you have passed for the Prevention of Bribery and of corrupt Practices at Elections, and I hope that it may prove effectual in the Correction of an Evil which, if unchecked, threatens to fix a deep stain upon our Representative System.

"It is My earnest Desire that on returning to your respective Counties you may preserve a Spirit of Union and Concord. Deprived of the Blessings of Peace abroad, it is more than ever necessary that we should endeavour to confirm and increase the Advantages of our internal Situation; and it is with the greatest Satisfaction that I regard the Progress of active Industry and the general Prosperity which happily prevails throughout the Country.

"DEEPLY sensible of these Advantages, it is My humble Prayer that we may continue to enjoy the Favour of the Almighty, and that, under His gracious Protection, we may be enabled to bring the present Contest to a just and honourable Termination."

Then the LORD CHANCELLOR, by HER MAJESTY'S Command, said—

"MY LORDS, AND GENTLEMEN,

"It is Her Majesty's Royal Will and Pleasure, That this Parliament be prorogued to Thursday the Nineteenth Day of October next, to be then here holden; and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued to Thursday the Nineteenth Day of October next."

HER MAJESTY and the PRINCE ALBERT, attended by the Great Officers of State, then retired; and the rest of the assembly immediately dispersed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Saturday, August 12, 1854.

THE EVACUATION OF THE DANUBIAN PRINCIPALITIES—QUESTION.

Mn. HUME said, he wished to know whether, before the House separated, any information could be given upon a subject which had been alluded to in another place two nights ago, as calculated to lead to a hope that the first object which this country had in view in declaring the war had been obtained, namely, clearing the Danubian Principalities of Russian troops, which appeared to have been effected entirely by the Turkish troops, backed, no doubt, by the support of the French and English forces. The country was very naturally most impatient to know the nature of the communication which Austria had made to France and England, requiring securities for future peace. It was important to know whether Austria and Prussia—more especially Austria—were prepared to concur with us in demanding these securities, which would prevent the peace of Europe being again disturbed upon such frivolous grounds as those upon which the present war had been commenced.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL stated, in answer to the question of the hon. Member, that there had been very lately a communication made by the Russian Minister at Vienna to the Government of His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Austria, stating that it was the intention of the Emperor of Russia to evacuate the Principalities—Moldavia as well as Wallachia; at the same time there was a declaration made by the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Austria to Her Majesty's Minister at Vienna, and to the French Minister at that Court on the same occasion, that he was ready to proceed to the interchange of notes which had been before agreed upon, notwithstanding the evacuation of the Principalities. The notes of the English and French Ministers contained a statement of the general nature of the securities which would be required for the future peace of Europe against the aggression of Russia. It was unnecessary for him to enter into the nature of these securities, as they had been stated in a very able paper by the French Minister on Foreign Affairs, which had been published by order of the Emperor in the Moniteur, and which hon. Members had no doubt seen. The answer of the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Emperor of Austria was so far satisfactory, as it showed that the Emperor of Austria would not be satisfied with the restoration of the status quo ante bellum, and that there was a general opinion with respect to the securities which were required by the English and French Governments being a proper basis of negotiation. The Austrian Minister did not go further at present. It remained to be seen whether the Government of His Imperial Majesty would think proper to communicate the interchange of notes which had taken place to the Government at St. Petersburg, and whether the armaments which had been made by the Emperor of Austria would be put in action in order to obtain by force, if they could not be obtained by negotiation, those securities which England and France had thought actually necessary, and which he trusted the German Powers would likewise concur in asking and insisting upon from Russia.

PROROGATION OF THE PARLIAMENT.

Message to attend HER MAJESTY.

The House went, and the Royal Assent was given to several Bills, after which HER MAJESTY was pleased to make a Most Gracious Speech to both Houses of Parliament.

Then the LORD CHANCELLOR, by HER MAJESTY's Command, said—

“MY LORDS, AND GENTLEMEN,

“It is HER MAJESTY's Royal will and pleasure, that this Parliament be prorogued to Thursday the nineteenth day of October next, to be then here holden; and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued to Thursday the nineteenth day of October.
